I am a clergy person and volunteer with the Osborne Association. I have been to Albion taking children to see their mothers and have witnessed the power of these very precious and tearful visits, during which physical contact (and especially hugging) is extremely important to mother and child. Visitation with one's child helps the incarcerated adult rehabilitate (this is proven) and helps the child thrive. Diminishing the power of visitation, especially through restrictions on physical contact, would do a disservice to both and be an undue punishment to the child.
