THE COUNCIL OF
THE CITY OF NEW YORK

June 1, 2012

The Honorable Michael R. Bloomberg
Mayor
City Hall
New York, NY 10007

Mayor Bloomberg,

We write to express our strong objection to the proposal that would ban stores and restaurants from selling soda and other sugary drinks in sizes larger than 16 ounces. This proposal is a clear intrusion into the rights of New Yorkers and represents a situation where government regulation has gone too far.

While we are concerned about the health of all New Yorkers, it is not the role of the government to tell its citizens how much food or beverage they are allowed to consume. Soda is not inherently bad for you. Many responsible, healthy, New Yorkers choose to consume soda in moderate amounts on certain occasions such as at a movie or baseball game. Drinking a 20oz bottled soda with lunch is standard practice for many New Yorkers and does not necessarily reflect an unhealthy lifestyle.

The United States was founded on the principals of freedom. We are free to choose a church, we are free to speak publically, we are free to choose our government leaders and we are free to make decisions about our body. The government should not, and cannot, regulate what we choose to eat and drink. New York City needs to trust its citizens to make their own decisions.

Should the government mandate that vegetables be served with every meal, regulate the size of candy bars and pizza slices, or ban bars from serving any customer more than two drinks all under the pretense of protecting our health? It is not the role of the government to tell us how to live our lives and the City should not attempt to do so, especially without the approval of the people's elected representatives in the Council.

We ask that you rescind this proposal and allow people to continue making their own decisions about how much soda they will drink. If you persist in pursuing this proposal, we insist that you put it before the Council for a vote.

I can understand what the Mayor is saying, BUT, this will not stop people from buying more soda. People will buy TWO drinks at once, etc. People will now put soda in big coffee type holders, and, bring them from home, etc. There will always be a way.

You have got to realize that we do NOT live in Russia. We live in the USA, and, we have our freedom to do as we please, as long as we are within the confines of the law. We should be able to eat, drink, AND, be merry living in the USA. This has gone too far, and, Michael Bloomberg is not in charge of my life. If he is, then, send him this e-mail, so he can send a few mil my way. I could desperately use it.

I am not going to stop smoking, or, drinking soda, because that is MY choice. I know that those are the feelings of many in this city.

I feel the people of this city should VOTE on a decision like this, not ONE man, and, a select few. Just because he is Mayor, does not mean he knows what's best for the people.

I know you will probably approve this, but, it's not right that only a select FEW get the chance to vote on this, take this up at election time, so ALL THE PEOPLE OF THE CITY can vote on this. Whatever that outcome is, I can RESPECT.

Let's see, how about putting a time limit on the people who go to the gym, or, any physical type of workout? So many minutes a day, so many days a week? I don't think they would like that!?

This is just another reason why I am planning to leave this city when my sister retires. It's a shame, I always loved this city, and, was proud to live here, but, not anymore. There are just too many ridiculous rules/laws/decisions, that the people who live here, should be entitled to vote on. Drinking something larger than a 16 oz soda? C'mon what has this city come to? There are way more important things to worry about.

Thank you for your time, and, consideration.

Sincerely,

Stacy A. Siryk

Big drink ban goes to board of health

I would like to share a thought with the rich, that makes the Laws in NYC. No one isn't sayin that cutting back on sweets or trying to redeem the obesity population isn't necessary however what about those families that can afford less. A evening at the movies for a large less privileged family that purchase a few large drinks (being that it would be more cost effective) to share among st a few siblings would no longer be an option. A weekend at the amusement park for a family less fortunate is not able to buy larger size soft drink or soda to share with there children. Typical NYC. They would have to cut back on the amount purchased while trying to treat there less than fortunate family. Its amazing no one interviewed or launched any sort of thought to the inner cities. Areas in the Bronx, Brooklyn and Harlem have thoughts or an opinion as well. It's easy to implement these types of rules for new yorker's that can afford it. You can purchase large size soda at the seven eleven and take to the movies or to an action park. Really...
What makes you think obesity is due to soft drinks? I guess because one selected Dr/physician agrees with the mayor. What gives him the right to select "best judgement"; he passed a law in order for him to control NYC. 3 consecutive times. Why should we trust his thoughts. I guess it's always about who have the largest bank account.

Very disturbed citizen

I do NOT drink anything with sugar, as I am diabetic. I also never gave this junk to my children. I am however, unalterably opposed to government interfering with people's right to buy any size (non-alcoholic) drink they choose, because it is frankly not government's business to watch my food and drink intake. I am totally in favor of educating the public on drinking far healthier alternatives to soda, and I personally advocate for plain water. However, it is my right as a free citizen of this country, to purchase and consume all legal potables, in quantities that I, not Mayor Bloomberg, not Dr. Whoever, deem appropriate.

Has it occurred to you that people often buy these drinks in large "gulps" because it is cheaper to apportion it out to share, than to buy several cups of drinks for their families? And what is to stop someone from buying two "legal" containers of sugary drink, when the bigger size drink is no longer available, and drinking down both at one time? Is the mayor planning to send soda police out to ensure that this will not be the case? How much will they fine someone for drinking more Pepsi than the legal quota? This is ridiculous, and ill becomes our mayor.

I have no vested interest in the soda companies, or in seeing to their financial benefit, and personally, I find these drinks to be disgusting. I do however, have a vested interest in seeing paternalistic government keep its nose out of my private life. If the mayor and all those doctors (rightly) want to see people make healthier choices in their diet, then by all means campaign for people to be better educated about the health issues that arise from too many sugary empty calories and not enough healthy ones.

The argument about obesity being caused by too much sugar consumption and therefore people should not be allowed to consume it in amounts that they choose, is only partly with merit. I do not consume much sugar at all, but have fought a weight problem for many years. My weight issues certainly have no soda consumption behind them, as I do not drink soda except on VERY rare occasions. What's next - you go after the burgers we eat? Force us to be vegetarian? Send someone to fine us if we snack in the middle of the night?

Get out of our refrigerators, get out of the 7-Eleven, and worry more about the truly serious problems of our City and State, like the fact that our teachers and administrators cannot speak proper English. Make sure our children are given the highest priority in their education from pre-school on, so that they know what healthy eating is. Give them healthy choices in the cafeteria and machines. But also understand, it is not your place to determine what we can and cannot drink on our own time.

To whom it may concern;

It has come to my attention that soda has come under fire for "making people fat." Apparently, there are some people in authority positions who believe if they make it illegal to consume soda, our obesity issues will be over. Sadly, this is far from truth.

It concerns me that our government is beginning to take it upon themselves to determine what citizens may and may not consume. Dare I ask what is next? Muffins made rogue? Cinnamon rolls? People running to Jersey for a milk shake?

It sounds like the mayor has friends in the concession industry. People may not consume a large drink, but may buy as many smaller drinks as they wish.

To add to the ridiculous, might I add to this law? Shall we imprison those who sit in front of the television for longer than two hours a day? No more than one movie ticket a week? All citizens must register for at least one outdoor activity a season? These examples may seem outlandish, but I'm sure our ancestors would say this current proposal is just as silly.

In conclusion, this proposed law is not only absurd, but it takes away one of our most basic rights as Americans, freedom. Freedom to make our own decisions, even if it isn't the healthiest. Freedom to consume food and drink of our choice. If this right is taken away, I fear which one will be next.

Sincerely,
A Concerned American

LAST I RECALL NOR THE HEALTH DEPARTMENT NOR THE GOVERNMENT NOR MAYOR BLOOMBERG PAYS FOR MY BILLS OR MY FOOD AND SO YOU HAVE NO RIGHT TO TELL ME WHAT TO EAT OR DRINK. YOU GUYS ONLY KNOW HOW TO TAKE ON THE EASY STUFF AND NOT THE HARD STUFF THAT REALLY MATTERS FOR OUR HEALTH. WHAT MAKES THE GOVERNMENT SURE THAT THE SUGAR INTAKE IS GOING TO BE CURBED BY THIS LAW AND THE SUGAR INTAKE WILL NOT BE CONSUMED BY ANOTHER MEANS. ARE YOU GOING TO BAN ALL THE OTHER FOODS THAT HAVE SUGAR OR ARE YOU GOING TO HAVE A FOOD COP IN EVERYBODY'S HOME TO MAKE SURE THAT THE SUGAR INTAKE IS NOT ABUSED? I THOUGHT THIS COUNTRY WAS SUPPOSED TO BE THE LAND OF THE FREE AND NOT THE LAND OF COMMUNISM. ALL THESE NEW BANS AND LAWS HAVE GONE TOO FAR. ALL YOU POLITICIANS ARE IN YOUR SEATS BECAUSE THE CITIZENS VOTED YOU IN TO REPRESENT US AND NOT REPRESENT WHAT YOU LIKE OR WANT. IF POLITICIANS AND GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS DON'T LIKE SUGARY STUFF THEN DON'T CONSUME THEM, OUR TAXES OBVIOUSLY ARE GOING TO THE WRONG PLACES AND FOR THE WRONG THINGS. HOW IS IT THAT THE OFFICIALS KNOW WHAT IS RIGHT FOR OUR HEALTH AND WE DO NOT KNOW? YOU DO NOT HEAR US FORBIDDING OR REGULATING WHAT IS RIGHT FOR YOU OR WHAT YOU LIKE, DO YOU? BEFORE YOU MAKE A LAW I THINK YOU SHOULD ASK THE CITIZENS TO VOTE INSTEAD OF MAKING SOMETHING A LAW BECAUSE YOU DO NOT LIKE IT. WHAT ARE YOU GOING TO BAN NEXT, THE MEDS WE TAKE TO GET BETTER, BECAUSE YOU DO NOT FEEL THAT THE MED IS RIGHT FOR ME? GET REAL. BY THE WAY MY NAME IS: EFTHIMIA DEMETRIADIS AND I CAN BE CONTACTED AT 718-854-4415. ENOUGH IS ENOUGH. DO YOUR JOBS.

To whom it may concern.

Since NYC is in the USA , which last I checked is still a "FREE" Country. No one should be subjected to bans of this nature. Mayor Bloomberg is out of control in thinking for other people in this instance. He has no Constitutional Right to impose "HIS WILL" over anyone else's. If people want more than 16 oz. it should be up to them. Mr. Farley did not even know certain schools under our Mayor's control had either no GYM"S in them or some kids don't have GYM classes. (Which is required by law I've heard). Soda alone is not the reason for obesity, it is a combination of bad choices. Video Games and Computers play a role also but alone are not the answer either. Why are they not banned? Nothing should be banned, just better information given especially to the kids.

Sincerely,

Michael Romano

In response to the proposal on banning sugary drinks.

Hello,

I agree that America is getting out of control. I would like to believe that banning certain establishments from selling sugary drinks over 16 ounces will be effective. Unfortunately I know it wont be. A person can easily by two 16ounce drinks for themselves which would be equal to the 32ounce they would have originally bought. An addiction is an addiction, a person will go to the extremes to get what their body is craving! Not to mention businesses would start to loose money and in an effort to decrease losses more than likely start to offer discounts/specials on sugary drinks. Consumers would eventually start buying more because they are already addicted. As many have stated, "sugar is the new nicotine." It is an addiction and cannot be cured with a banned. Instead the city needs to focus its attention on raising awareness on why certain food groups are unhealthy and how unhealthy. We started off good by mandating food establishments to post the calories for each item. There are many other ways to continue raising awareness, its just a matter of what the city's true intentions are. Is it to improve America's health? or Is it to reinforce their authority? If the city really wants to make an effective effort they should not ban anything, instead continue to raise awareness because at the end of the day its the peoples choice.

Sincerely,

S

It's about time someone government stepped up to the plate and is trying to do something about the obesity of this country too bad though that this bill if passed it doesn't even begin to scratch the surface.

Hats off to Bloomberg good for you, Now lets BAN the sweeteners that these billion dollar companies are using or start holding them responsible for the crap they sell. Look at other countries and the products/additives they have banned and follow suit, Oh my mistake is it not Big business that runs this country it's "no longer government for the people by the people" I believe it's "Government for the Businesses by the Businesses". Talk about the power of the dollar "Who sold out the people? Government? Big Business? Wall Street? Think we go with all of the above.

soda pop ban

I was at first amused by your anti-soda pop crusade and thought it was an April Fool's joke of some kind. But now I am concerned about the sanity of your city's government officials.

Out here I can own as many guns as I want, drink as much sugar soda as I want, eat popcorn popped in high transfat oil and slathered with artery lubricating butter, salt my French fries to my heart's content, smoke a cigar, and generally enjoy a life free from the nanny state.

Instead of worrying about sugar, salt, and fat, perhaps you should consider checking your drinking water there for hallucinogens. Maybe General Jack Ripper (Dr. Strangelove) was right. It's has to be something, and I doubt if it's sugar, salt, fat, or nicotine.

When big gulps are outlawed, only outlaws will have big gulps.

Smoking, Alcohol, Drugs are all inherently bad for you. They are addictive and have immediate consequences on both you and those around you. Soda does not.

Consumer Reports Says Small doesn't mean low-calorie either

Dear Commissioner Farley:

I applaud your efforts to regulate huge-size drinks with high calories and lots of sugar. However, people might think they are making a smarter choice at a fast food outlet with a smaller-sized treat or one that sounds like it has healthy ingredients.

In fact,Consumer Reports found that the smaller drinks below are packed with calories and sugar too:

Just 6 ounces of Wendy's Junior Original Chocolate Frosty has 200 calories

A 12 ounce Starbucks Tazo Green Tea Frappuccino with blended cream and skim milk has 290 calories

A small Orange Julius Original has 230 calories in 16 ounces

A small Dunkin Donuts Strawberry Coolatta at 16 ounces has 230 calories.

So there's no substitute for checking the calories and sugars online or on the store display.

Best regards,

In addition, I very often purchase a large size drink to share with my children, and this new ruling will cost me more money when I am out with my family. Certainly the mayor understands that families have to have budgets these days, too. Let the government work on funding schools and senior centers and keep out of peoples diets!

Comment:	While I as a reasonable human being respect the Mayors intention to make New York residents healthier, one cannot expect a free people to succumb to the sort of government mandates on the order of making certain sugary soft drink sizes illegal that are becoming all too common for this Mayor and his administration to propose. Whether it is cigarettes, or sugary drinks, trans-fat oils, the eatery grading system or another well-intentioned vehicle to force societal changes in behavior, I must as an American stand for freedom of the individual in their decision-making, and I place my trust in individuals to make their own decisions. I apologize to the Mayor that I do not share the level of desire to alter human habits as he, even if for the greater good, because I strongly believe government should not be in the business of culling dietary choices by fiat.

Comment:	Consumption of sugary drinks is not healthy, pierod. However the Mayor and the city should not propose a ban on the size of sugary drinks that can be sold. Not being able to buy a supersized drink will not stop people from consuming them, they will only buy 2 regular sized drinks. Instead of banning the size of sugary drinks that can be sold why dont we instead education the population. A more useful approach would be an education campaign that explains a healthy diet, a healthy portion size, the need for exersize etc. A really good place to start would be in our public schools. Why dont we put money into revamping the school food system with actual food instead of processed so called meat and veggies. Why dont we actually serve our child actual meat, veggies, fruit, dairy etc. In the process we can educate our children as to what a healthy meal actually is and what a healthy portion actually is. A ban on the size of sugary drinks will on! ly hurt merchants in the long run, and will not solve the obesity problem in this city.

Comment:	I weigh over 300 pounds. I rarely ever buy a super sized soda, super sized popcorn or shake. Large shakes have been around long before obesity was an issue. If this ban on foods gets passed, I vow to put on 20 pounds out of spite. It would probably only take me a month to do. See, it is easier to put on weight than regulate it. You will have to ban all food advertisements on TV, all rice that isnt brown, all processed foods and all vegetables that are white. Then you can have Bloomberg ban all the chemicals in the air that give people asthma and cancer, including his helicopter that likes to park illegally in a residential area, because cigarettes dont cause that. Then find a way to regulate where people can smoke the marijuana Bloomberg is so set on legalizing, because I sure as hell dont want to inhale that garbage. Then ban any plastics that have DHT. What else? Why dont you just go ban yourself?

Comment: While on the surface, I think the idea of restricting the sale of large sugary drinks is a great idea (i.e. No one needs 32 oz of soda) I think this rule infringes on the U.S. citizens right to choose. I know its only soda, but its soda this year, and it might be potato chips next year, and hamburgers the following. Approving a rule like this sets a precedent that the government can actually tell you what you can and can not eat, and then where does that end? This rule is a VERY slippery slope.

Also, people arent stupid. If they want 32oz of soda, theyll just buy 2 16 oz sodas.

Why not tax the sugary drinks like we do cigarettes so they become cost prohibitive? Maybe then kids wont be able to buy large sodas with their meagre allowance and parents wont be able to stock the stuff for kids to drink.

Comment:	Stop killing mom pop stores! NY is already widely known as a terrible place to do small business; dont make our reputation worse. With much fanfare, EDC incubates new small businesses, where 9 of 10 fail; meanwhile youre killing the established businesses employing tens of thousands. Dah!

Comment:	The beverage vendors are not geared for providing plastic bottled beverages less than 20 oz. They can only provide 12 oz cans. They are more expensive. 12 oz plastic is also more expensive. My customers will not pay 1.50 for a 12 oz Pepsi. You want to better the health of NYers, then reduce the price of healthy food and increase the price of your happy meals. A fruit cup in the health food establishment costs 9.99. That is just crazy.

Soda Ban

To whom it may concern:

Due to the constant encroachment of government intrusion in day to day lives, I would ask you remove the discussion of the ban on sodas.

At some point in time, the government has to let the an individual to take responsibility for their own actions.

Thanks for your time,

Comment:	Enough of BIG BROTHER BLOOMBERG. The last time I checked it out, this was the USA. Enough with the emposed rules and regulations. What will you want to control next? Enough with rules and controls. The calorie signs are terrific. They are information and we can decide for ourselves. Just post the info or put it on the cups and let people figure it out for them selves. Those who care will use the info. Those who dont care will ignore it. Restricting size will only promote FREE REFILLS or buy one get one free.

Comment:	While it is commendable that you want to do something about the obesity problem, creating a nanny state is not the solution. Creating more and more rules means increased costs to businesses. Just ask businesses in California how theyre doing with having to comply with a myriad of regulations. Please allow people to have freedom of choice. I think it was great that calorie counts must be disclosed. Let the individual decide what size drink they want.

Comment:	To me, this is a classic case of of personal rights Vs state health authority. When the public cant or wont take responsibility to choose foods that are in their best interest for the health of their children, government intervention becomes necessary. At a time when Diabetes is affecting close to 1/3 of our children and growing, it seems to me health authorities have no choice but to take action. The argument that this ban will have a negative impact on business simply doesnt compare to the damaging effects on our declining national health due to inappropriate food choices particularly by the poor who then depend on public health care paid by tax dollars.

If we dont want the government taking away our right to choóse, then we must take responsibility for our choices.

Comment:	This is not an effective way to fight obesity. Its merely another way for the Govt to be intrusive into our individual lives and choices. Fighting obesity begins with individuals making individual choices. As a taxpayer, I have hit my limit with this type of legislation. As an American, I feel this is just another way for the Govt to interfere with my individual choices. And if the counter-argument is well, you always have the choice to purchase more in order to get the same amount if you choose, then why bother with this legislation at all? As far as Im concerned, this is just another way for the Govt to impose their will on individuals. I am not obese. So why do my choices get narrowed for spending my life being active and maintaining a healthy weight? Why should I bother to make an effort at all if the Govt is going to begin a one size fits all regime. This is just the beginning. There will soon be laws against bacon, alcohol or anything else ! the Govt deems as unhealthy. Its none of the Govts business what I eat.

Comment: STATEMENT OF DODI MEYER, MD, ASSOCIATE CLINICAL PROFESSOR OF PEDIATRICS AND DIRECTOR OF COMMUNITY PEDIATRICS, COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY MEDICAL CENTER/NEW YORK PRESBYTERIAN HOSPITAL

"As a pediatrician working in clinical and public health settings, I have seen firsthand the effects that obesity has had on NYCs children. They are not only more prone to problems later in life, but are already suffering health consequences that are affecting their daily lives. My patients are suffering now from breathing problems during sleep time, some have joint diseases and other are suffering from severe psychiatric issues due to the stigmatization that goes on in school settings. We as a society are responsible to offer children the best future that they can possibly have. It is the first time in history that the next generation is in danger of having a lower life expectancy that the previous one because of the health effects of the current obesity epidemic. Curtailing the sale of supersize sugary drinks can have a huge impact on the health of our children and therefore allow them to live to their maximum potential."

Comment:	As a nephrologist practicing in Camden, NJ -- an impoverished community -- I see every day the ravages of obesity in the increasing incidence of hypertension and chronic kidney disease. The trivial issues of personal freedom in this case pale before the public health and welfare exigency.

Comment:	As a health care practitioner and a citizen, I am concerned about the increased rates of obesity and diabetes in my fellow New Yorkers. I believe that the government has a legitimate interest in promoting heath. It is reasonable to limit dangerous caloric intake in the same manner that it is legitimate to prohibit the sale of tobacco to minors or to encourage breast feeding. People eat whatever is on their plates and drink whatever is in their cups - so make portions smaller for the benefit of everyone.

Comment: Harlem RBIs mission is to provide inner city youth with opportunities to Play, Learn and Grow. We use the power of teams to coach, teach and inspire youth to recognize their potential and realize their dreams.

When Harlem RBI youth graduate from the program, they are expected to embody several valuable attributes, one of which is to be physically healthy.

Given the particular health challenges present in East Harlem—which include epidemic levels of childhood obesity, asthma and diabetes—Harlem RBI views this as a vital and unique aspect of its program, which is why we focus on physical education, nutrition and health. For that reason, we vigorously support New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg's proposal to ban the sale of extra-large sugary drinks from public venues.

Comment:	Well-intended but pointless because enforcement will be too burdensome. We already have an abundance of laws we cannot adequately enforce. For example, ordinary littering continues to be a daily occurrence all over NYC. Noise pollution and noise complaints increase but so does the noise. All this energy and hype distract us from more meaningful action and keep the press, politicians, and the unfortunate public under the false impression that significant changes can occur this way. Bring back more physical activities for everyone and reduce the focus on entertainment and consumption, more effective in the long run than these red-herring token attempts at changing the unrelenting status quo.

Comment:	Its necessary with unpopular measures to combat the obesity epidemic. Not all people are capable of doing the right things for themselves. Not all kids have sensible and knowledgeable parents making the right decisions for them. Many people need help to say no, or shouldnt have to choose between bad choices. Mayor Bloomberg is doing the right here and with a lot of other things when it comes to public health. Many leaders should be as brave and following him on this path. He has my strongest support.

Comment:	Sugar sweetened beverages are the biggest source of empty calories in the American diet. Reputable medical professionals are sharing the research that shows for each additional soda a child drinks, his or her risk of obesity goes up 60%. Kentucky has the third highest rate of childhood obesity so parents like me need to heed their warnings and protect our children. Lexington KY eventually followed NYC with a smoking ban and I hope we will do the same with the soda cup size limitation one day. Please set the example for the rest of the country to catch up with you eventually.

If they want more, they can order more, and pay for it. Society, as a whole, is paying for our excesses. Were only human. Better laws, such as the one proposed here, can help. Comment on Sugary Drink regulation

Ellen Rautenberg [erautenberg@healthsolutions.org]
Sent: Wednesday, June 27, 2012 11:15 AM
To: Resolution Comments

Addressing the obesity epidemic is a public health necessity but extremely complex. A variety of mutually reinforcing interventions, starting in early childhood, are needed to prevent obesity from occurring. Even more difficult is intervening once excessive weight gain has begun. Limiting portion size is one important approach to this multifaceted problem and applying this to sugary drinks, particularly those with no nutritional value, is an excellent place to begin. We went from happily accepting bottles of soda that were 6.5 fluid ounces and have now come to expect that a "regular" or "normal" sized drink is 32 ounces (for reference, a typical can of soda is 12 ounces). It is logical that if we still want to drink those sugary drinks we could again be very satisfied with one of 16 ounces or less and re-establish the norm at a size that provides considerably fewer calories.

Public comments by Barry Popkin

As an economist (PhD) and Nutrition Epidemiologist who has worked extensively on issues of dietary patterns and trends and there health effects in the US, I wish to comment on both perspectives.

Economics perspective:

Obesity represents major negative costs to all Americans[1]. We often term them negative externalities. Obesity debilitates and does not kill quickly. As a result, the obesity-related costs for purchasers of health insurance and the taxpayers who pay for Medicaid and Medicare and social security disability benefits are enormous[2-5]. It is the costs in terms of chronic noncommunicable diseases such as diabetes, osteoarthritis and all the related disabilities that are particularly pernicious and expensive. The impact of obesity on employability (thus unemployment insurance) is really significant. People go into nursing homes 4-7 years earlier if significantly overweight, become disabled and take out disability payment 3-7 years earlier(depending on the weight status[6,7].

In addition obesity clusters in selected subpopulations where the costs are particularly severe and require intensive household support systems to take care of the disabled. These indirect effects on many communities are only beginning to be understood for the ways it affects the employability of other household members.

Nutrition and public health perspective:

We have undertaken a number of studies of calorie change and its causes in the US. Depending on the age-gender subpopulation, intake of kcal/day from food and beverages have increased between 200 and 350 kcal/day over the past 40 years.[8] We have seen a small decrease during the great recession but there is no indication this will be permanent. A lot of scholars have attempted to understand the causes of this calorie increase. We have concluded that added sugar, particularly sugar-sweetened beverages, accounts for at least half of this caloric change[9-11]. My work has also shown large shifts in the proportions of beverages that come in large portion sizes (see JAMA paper below).

I am many other colleagues have conducted studies on the impact of sugar-sweetened beverages on health. We conducted the first random-controlled trial among adults, this one among those engaged in active weight loss programs. The replacement of sugar-sweetened beverages with water or diet beverages led to a significant weight loss[12]. We have also reviewed how replacing water with SSB's reduces considerably weight[13]. Other reviews have shown the unanimity of studies conducted that SSB's are a major cause of diabetes and heart disease. [14,15]

Portion sizes have increased significantly among all foods and beverages, but the increase among SSB's is particularly significant. In one paper in JAMA we documented this huge increase in consumption levels of larger portions of SSB's[16]. Subsequently we found in many studies similar effects on children. We know from extensive studies that increased portion sizes are linked with increased dietary intake in dozens of studies by Wansink, Rolls and many others. [17-28]

Our increased portion sizes of beverages, first seen in fast-food establishments, have spread to all sorts of foods and beverages. It has changed America's norms for portion sizes of all foods and beverages. This NYC proposed regulation is the first to begin the dialog about returning to some level of normalcy.

This is very important not only for NYC and the US but for nations across the globe affected by the same changes. The public health and economic benefits of shifting this norm in NYC will be important in the long-term for the US and ultimately the globe.

As a scholar and individual concerned particularly with problems of low income America, this shift is a critical first step to addressing this important component of the obesity epidemic.

I feel the symbolic significance of this proposal is equally important. It is just another way that citizens of New York as well as the millions of tourists who visit NYC will be told that obesity is a social problem warranting government intervention.

In summary the costs of obesity on our citizenry and society are enormous and certainly equal to those of smoking. This is because obesity debilitates and does not kill that millions of disabled Americans owe their disability to obesity. Reducing SSB intake is a critical component of any strategy. Just a shift to water and away from SSB's or a shift to noncaloric beverages would prevent half of the future obesity we would see emerge in the next decade. This proposal is a critical step forward that I support.

Comment: The sugar-sweetened beverage portion size rule makes sense. There are no health benefits to these ridiculous sizes. If people want more soda to drink, they can buy more. But these norms and initiatives are necessary to highlight the health effects of these seemingly benign drink sizes.

Dear Dr. Farley,

I am opposed to Mayor Bloombergs proposed ban on sale of drinks bigger than 16 oz. Because of the potential of an acceleration of taking away of many of our rights to choices.
I believe I am capable of making decisions that are wise for me, I don't need a politician telling me what to do.

Dear Dr. Farley,

I believe that education, not limiting the size if a drink is the way to help people lose weight. Setting up free classes could also help.

I do not believe that limiting the size of a drink is the answer.

Comment:	While recognizing the weaknesses of any specific measure, I think it very important that a first step be made in reducing the marketing pressures that drive the public toward bad nutritional practices. This is a major health menace, on the same scale as tobacco, alcohol, narcotics, evniromental pollution and the general public is demonstrably unable to recognize or manage the risk, so it is an appropriate role for government, I applaud Mr Bloomberg for his foresight.

Comment:	TOS supports efforts to reduce consumption of sugar-sweetened beverages

Silver Spring, MD - The Obesity Society supports the efforts of Mayor Bloomberg to ban the sale of sugar-sweetened beverages larger than 16 ounces. This is a measure that will help efforts to reduce consumption of sugar-sweetened beverages, which research shows are a major contributor to increased calorie intake by both children and adults, thus potentially contributing to the nation's obesity epidemic.

Two-thirds of American adults and over half of Canadians are overweight or obese1-2. In addition to the significant cost it imposes on the nation's health care system, obesity at any age increases the risk of many chronic illnesses, such as cardiovascular disease, some types of cancer, and type 2 diabetes, and can significantly worsen quality of life.

Although obesity is caused by myriad of factors, there is a large body of evidence suggesting that a significant contributor to consumption of extra calories over the last three decades is the over- consumption of sugar-sweetened beverages including soda, sports and energy drinks, fruit drinks, and enhanced waters3. Research indicates that Americans consume nearly 200-300 more calories per day than 30 years ago, with the largest single increase in calories due to sugar-sweetened beverages.4 Calories from sugar-sweetened beverage are empty calories because they are typically devoid of nutrients other than simple sugar. In contrast, 100% fruit juices, while containing natural sugars, do often contain vitamins and minerals. Research also suggests that sugar-sweetened beverages fail to produce the feeling of satiety that occurs from calories derived from solid foods, thus potentially contributing to overeating.5

The substantial increase in calorie intake from sugar-sweetened beverages is explained in part by increasing portion size: the 6 ½ ounce single serving bottle enjoyed in the 1960s has given way to the 20 ounce drink found in vending machines and store cold cases, and to the 20-32 ounce drinks in chain stores and restaurants. The New York initiative specifically targets this problem and attempts to bring serving sizes of these beverages back to a more reasonable range. Although the relationship between sugar-sweetened beverage consumption and increased calorie intake is strong3, it should be noted that not all research demonstrates a link between sugar-sweetened beverage consumption and obesity.6

Sugar-sweetened beverages have also been demonstrated to have an adverse effect on obesity-related chronic diseases such as type 2 diabetes and hypertension. In a study of 91,249 women followed for 8 years, those who consumed one or more servings of soft drink per day were twice as likely as those who consumed 1 serving per month to develop diabetes.7 These effects remained significant after controlling for BMI, energy intake and other potential confounders. Studies have also found associations between sugar-sweetened beverage intake and blood pressure.8

Comment:	Bravo to the Mayor who knows that life is our most important possession. He also knows that since soda sizes have reached elephantine proportions, so have the body weights of NYC soda drinkers. Obesity is the strongest risk factor, (a close tie with smoking), for living fewer years and becoming sick as you age. New Yorkers can choose to live longer and healthier lives with less soda, or choose to carry around 100 extra pounds, be at risk for heart disease, cancer and diabetes die young but full of soda. For those without the intelligence to escape the advertising pressure and low prices of soda, an informed adult is making it just a little easier for them to make the right decisions for themselves and their children.

Dear Ms. Bryant:

On behalf of Union Settlement Association, I am writing to express my strong support to the Board of Health's proposed amendment to Article 81 of the Health Code, to limit the maximum size of sugary drinks in self-service beverage cups sold and offered in food service establishments. This amendment is an important step in the ongoing effort to reduce the incidence of obesity and diabetes in New York City, particularly in underserved communities, and we strongly urge its prompt adoption.

Union Settlement Association ("Union Settlement"), which was established in 1895, is the oldest and largest social service agency in East Harlem, one of New York City's poorest neighborhoods. We serve more than 13,000 residents each year through a wide array of programs, including early childhood education, youth after-school and summer programs, adult education, mental health services, senior services, home care and more.

Union Settlement has worked extensively to address health disparities in East Harlem, including efforts to bring health nutrition education and practices in our childcare, youth and senior programs; address the problem of childhood asthma; increasing awareness and reducing the incidence of diabetes and obesity and bringing "healthy aging" activities into our senior community. Just last year we were awarded the inaugural Joan H. Tisch Community Health Prize for our accomplishments in the field of urban public health.

The twin perils of obesity and diabetes are huge problems in this community – 60% of adults, 33% of teens and 46% of elementary school children are either overweight or obese, with the highest prevalence of obesity and diabetes cases citywide. More than a third of high school students report not exercising at least 20 minutes a day, three days per week. Nearly 60% watch TV at least three hours a day. There is scant safe recreational space. We are committed to programming focused on improving the health of our children before a lifetime of unhealthy eating habits and physical activity leads to obesity and disease.

As you know, the excessive consumption of sugary drinks is one of the major contributing causes of this epidemic. Sugary drinks are responsible for over 40% of the added sugar intake in the average American's diet, and children who consume sugary drinks are at much greater risk of becoming obese, and also significantly are at increased risk to develop diabetes and heart disease. According to the 2009 Child Health Survey and Youth Risk Behavior Survey, almost 45% of New York City children ages 6 to 12 consumed more than one sugary drink per day, and over 25% of high school students consumed two or more sugary drinks per day. There is no question that increasing sugary drink portion sizes are contributing greatly to this program, because they cause individuals to consume more.

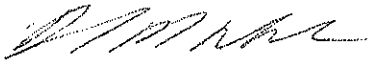
Last year, the Fund for Public Health in New York selected Union Settlement as the Manhattan partner for their Communities Putting Prevention to Work – Obesity Community Engagement Program. The program sought to educate New York City residents about the role that sugar-sweetened beverages play in the obesity epidemic, to educate other nonprofits to the dangers of sugary beverages, and initiate intuitional policy change at these nonprofits. We made presentations to 17 community partners about the health consequences of sugar-sweetened beverage consumption, which a total of 1,150 people attended. We also presented to approximately 1,000 staff and participants at Union Settlement, and revised our own policy to eliminate sugar-sweetened beverages in vending machines and at activities. Unfortunately, it was clear that many individuals were completely unaware of the amount of sugar in drinks, or the impact that these projects had on their calorie intake and their health in general.

The proposed amendment to the Health Code is an intelligent, measured and appropriate response to this problem. By limiting the size of sugary drinks and self-service beverage cups sold by food service establishments, the rule will reduce the amount of sugary drinks consumed, and thereby help to reduce obesity, diabetes and other health problems, particularly in underserved communities. Moreover, the rule in no way limits consumer choice, because individuals are always free to purchase additional servings if they choose to do so.

In short, this is a common sense proposal that unquestionably will improve the health of tens of thousands of New York City residents, particularly in underserved communities, and we strongly support its adoption.

Thank you for considering our views on this issue, and please feel free to contact me if you have any questions or need any further information.

Sincerely,



David Nocenti
Executive Director

Comment:	I am writing to support the efforts of NYC in limiting the portion sizes of sugary drinks to 16 ounces. There is clear and powerful research evidence that sugary drinks lead to not only obesity but a range of health problems. There is also research that people are very responsive to portion size - they drink more when given more, even without realizing it. Therefore, the idea of limiting the portions sold of these health damaging beverages makes both scientific and common sense.

Comment: If the government is not intended to protect our health to better our lives, what is it for?

If we dont take action now, well have to explain to our grandkids and great grandkids why we didnt when they ask.

If we cared about the American people and their freedoms, we would take action and limit portion sizes in NYC and in other cities. With industry lobbying and advertising with millions of dollars every year, its almost like we are trapped and do not have our American freedoms. New York is a nanny state--but the nanny is actually multi-million dollar companies trying to get you to drink their product.

Comment:	(for, with proposed modification)

Distinguished members of the NYC Board of Health,

I would like to express my strong support, as a pedatrician and as a public health professional, for the proposed restriction on the size of sugary beverages. The consumption of these products, even in modest quantities, has been clearly and directly associated with health conditions such as obesity and diabetes, currently epidemic in our city. As a pediatrician, I never saw a case of what was formerly called adult onset diabetes in children when I was training, whereas today it is not an uncommon problem in our school system. There are even bariatric surgery units for teens. These consequences are even more severe for our black and Latino population. Heavy consumption of sugary drinks is well documented in the scientific literature to be a key contributor to this situation. Reduction of consumption is likewise associated with improved health outcomes.

This increasing consumption is due, not to personal choice, as the industry alleges, but to conscious manipulation of the food supply by the soda industry and restaurants to promote the consumption of ever-increasing sizes and volumes of their products. Indeed the average number of ounces a person consumes is said to be a key marketing indicator for the industry.

Soda has been transformed from a small 6 or 7 ounce occasional treat in the 50s to a 20 ounce replacement for water in this century, with the gravest of health consequences. In the restaurant environment this change is most notable in the chain restaurant industry, with far less supersizing in our mom and pop restaurants.

The Board should move forward with its courageous stance to shift the social norm of size back to something the human body can handle slightly better. Indeed, since the consumption of even a single regular soda a day has been associated with harm, I would suggest that the board consider limiting the size for pre-packaged beverages, served without ice, to no more than 10 or 12 ounces, the size of a typical can, while allowing the slightly larger size of 16 oz. for fountain drinks.

While this alone will not solve the obesity epidemic, it will be one more important step in creating a series of changes in our food and physicial activity environments, which together can reverse the epidemic which plagues New York City adults and children.

Reversing the obesity epidemic is a national priority. It will not be accomplished without significant changes back towards a healthier food supply, such as this important proposal.

Sincerely,

Lynn Silver, MD, MPH

Comment:	Instinctually, I am for the message of the ban. However I would caution against it only because of how naysayers are using it to further portray such efforts as imposition, and subsequently refine their right to blow their health away (at the cost to themselves, and society at large). In a better world we, would be able to tax-up blatantly unhealthy foods and have revenue funneled directly to publicly funded health care systems. P.S. I am available for work.

Comentario de oposici??n: Tama??o de bebidas azucaradas

Dear Dr. Farley,

Como un residente de la Ciudad de Nueva York, le escribo hoy para pedirle que por favor rechace la prohibición propuesta de la venta de bebidas de fuente y bebidas embotelladas de más de 16 onzas.

Restringir la venta de ciertos tamaños de bebidas en la ciudad de Nueva York perjudica a nuestros restaurantes, teatros, locales de deportes, cafeterías, camiones de alimentos, carritos callejeros y todos aquellos que dependen de la venta de bebidas para su sustento.

Además, creo que debería ser mi decisión, y no de mi gobierno, elegir mis porciones. La respuesta a la lucha contra la obesidad es la dieta, ejercicio, y un estilo de vida saludable, y no las restricciones sobre los refrescos, jugos, bebidas deportivas y tés.

En nombre de neoyorquinos como yo, por favor rechace la prohibición propuesta de la venta de bebidas de más de 16 onzas en la Ciudad de Nueva York.

Sincerely,

DISAPPROVE the Mayor's Sensible Beverage Proposal

DISAPPROVE! KEEP YOUR LAWS OFF. TOO MUCH CONTROL! VERY VERY BAD IDEA! HOW ABOUT MORE MONEY FOR EDUCATION. IT'S TIME FOR BLOOMBERG TO GET OUT OF OFFICE. BAD MAYOR. MAKES THE RULES FOR HIM SELF. HOW ABOUT NOT CHANGING THE LAWS THAT PROHIBITS RUNNING FOR TWO ELECTIONS NOT THREE.

MR. BLOOMBERG, GET OUT OF THE WAY. KEEP YOUR MIND ON RUNNING THE CITY AND NOT RUNNING PEOPLE'S LIVES. YOU ARE OVER THE TOP.

BAD IDEA....YOUR IDEAS ARE SO UNREALISTIC. TIME FOR YOU TO GET OUT OF OFFICE

NACCHO
National Association of County & City Health Officials
The National Connection for Local Public Health

The Honorable Michael Bloomberg
City Hall
New York, NY 10007

Dear Mayor Bloomberg:

On behalf of the National Association of County and City Health Officials (NACCHO), I am writing to express support and appreciation for your efforts to provide access to healthy options for New Yorkers. As the national voice for local health departments, NACCHO is a leader, partner, and catalyst to ensure that people are able to make choices that keep them healthier and living longer. Specifically, I want to commend your recent initiative to amend the New York City Health Code to establish a maximum size for sugary drinks offered or sold in Food Service Establishments in order to address the obesity epidemic and decrease the consumption of sugary drinks by New Yorkers.

As you know, sugar-sweetened beverages are the largest source of added sugars in the diet of U.S. youth, increasing their intake of calories—a factor potentially contributing to obesity among youth nationwide. According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, more than one-third of adults and close to one-fifth of children and adolescents in the United States are obese. From 1980 to 2010, obesity among adults increased from 15% to 36%. CDC predicts if current trends continue, obesity will reach 42% by 2030. Obesity-related conditions include heart disease, stroke, type 2 diabetes and certain types of cancer. In 2008, medical costs associated with obesity were estimated at $147 billion.

New York City is an innovator in chronic disease prevention and NACCHO applauds your national leadership in creating a policy environment that promotes healthy behaviors. This is particularly important in terms of achieving health equity for low-income populations that suffer disproportionately from illness, disability, and premature death due to diabetes and heart disease, for which obesity is a prime cause.

NACCHO shares New York City's view that a comprehensive approach to reducing the obesity epidemic is essential to the future well-being of the nation. It is also essential that states, cities and counties take initiative to discover public health solutions that can be replicated in other parts of the country and drive down the ever growing cost of addressing obesity related diseases.

Again, thank you for your efforts to address the health and quality of life of the residents of your city.

Sincerely,

Robert M. Pestronk
Executive Director

Comment: the option for this gigantic portion should never have been created in the first place - it is so unhealthy. people consume empty calories without thinking because it is available to them and because they paid for it. if portions were smaller, we would not have such an obesity problem in this country. i am totally for this proposal and for a healthier New York.

Comment:	Bigger is not always better...when is a bargain not a bargain...thats what comes to mind when I observe folks settling in for a film with a giant size popcorn to be washed down with their 32 oz. container of soda. If they would listen to their bodies they might hear a litte voice saying, Youre killing me-I feel lousy-why do you keep doing this to me?!!! I understand that it is hard to say, No when you have entered into a food or a bargain trance. When taking a breath and saying, No is not possible because no gets lost when rationalizing kicks in. Reducing the the 32 oz. container to 16 oz. (I vote for 8oz., personally) at various venues will give people an opportunity to make a more thoughtful choice...will 16 oz. be sufficient or will they really feel the need for another bottle?Hopefully not! Will the need to indulge in bargains possibly lead to future health risks-that would be sad and costly. Perhaps, in time, that little voice will become more powerful and be able to say, Thanks for listening to me.... With the support of Mayor Bloombergs Antii Obesity Initiative that may be possible.

Comment: I am stating my opposition to Health Code Article 81, restricting sizes of soda sales, for it is another example of the hubris of Bomberg and his elite acolytes reaching into the minds and pocketbooks of this Citys populace. The proof of this hubris is Bombergs usual routine of skirting elected bodies of legislation and bringing his agenda to officials - appointed by him!

Whatever agenda or issues you are addressing, DOH and other governmental agencies are once again tampering with and impinging upon its citizens rights and choices.

Additionally, this article will further impact the already-troubled and harassed small business sector of our economy with more rules, regulations, inspections, and, of course, the ever money-making machinery of fines.

There is a real epidemic ongoing for years, and that is the pollution and proliferation of new rules, fines, and harassment by the non-elected officials of various bureaucracies aided and abetted by non-profit packs of social do-gooders. Their non-profit status, by the way, is funded by my taxes, for they do not have to pay to exist.

Howse about paring down all the bureaucracies (with their pensions and benefits) and stop out-sourcing work to Pittsburgh and Newark (that I know of) by the Dept of Finance and bring these bucks and jobs to the City.

Comment: I strongly support Mayor Bloomberg's initiative to reduce the sizes of sugary beverages. Soda is only okay in limited amounts. The mass consumption of soda is poisoning the children and adults of our city, contributing to very serious (yet avoidable) health risks. By limited its consumption, the Mayor is providing a great public service. Hopefully this initiative will open the eyes of millions of individuals and steer them towards healthier, and even more delicious, alternatives to drink and eat.

Comment: The Mayor has created a loud, and necessary, conversation about the health benefits of controlling one's consumption of sweetened beverages that are marketed to consumers. What may seem like a treat at a dollar value really is just sugar or corn syrup, flavoring and coloring, empty calories that certainly cause more harm than good. Let's make more healthy food choices available to our city residents. To really quench your thirst, I recommend ice cold New York tap water with a healthy squeeze of fresh lemon and lime.

Comment:	VERY against. Prohibitionh proved you cant legislate behavior, and theres a saying that goes approximately like this: Those who refuse to learn the lessons of history are doomed to repeat them. First it was cigarettes, now its large cups of soda. Im almost 64, I dont smoke, and I only occaisionally have a soda of any size, but even if all that was different, my sentiments would be the same: STAY THE HELL OUT OF MY LIFE!!! At this late date, I dont need Massa Bloomberg or his minions deciding whats best for me.

Rule: Article 81 - Food Preparation and Food Service Establishments

Opinion on Proposed Rule: For

Comment: I support Mayor Bloomberg's proposed ban on large sized sugary drinks. It is one way to help people realize how harmful sugar, fat and salt is in their diets and that people need to be more conscious about what they put in their mouths. Right now we are in the middle of an obesity epidemic such that over 40% of NYC children and 50% of NYC adults are overweight or obese. This makes them likely candidates for all sorts of diet-related diseases: type II diabetes, heart disease, hyper-tension and joint diseases. These diminish the quality of their lives and it expands the amount of resources the government is then required to spend in order to serve their needs. Some mechanisms, such as limiting the volume of these sugary drink servings, should be applied to slow down the rate of obesity in our people. I would like Mayor Bloomberg to go further. I would like to see a ban on all advertisements of sugary drinks, fast food, and other nutrient-poor fo! ods, aimed at children during children's viewing hours on TV. I feel very strongly about protecting our people, and especially our children, from the greed of unhealthy food and drink manufacturers. I support the ban on large size sugary drinks because I want to see our people lead healthy, effective and long lives. The ban on large size sugary drinks is one small building block in that direction.

Rule: Article 81 - Food Preparation and Food Service Establishments

First Name: Dennis Rivera Chair The Partnership for Quality Care

Opinion on Proposed Rule: For

Comment: We have seen a rise in efforts to combat sugar-sweetened beverage intake in states across the country. With this proposal, Mayor Bloomberg is raising the bar and taking a big step toward making New Yorkers healthier. Chronic conditions such as obesity and diabetes threaten the lives of millions of people all across our country - many of them children - contributing more to health costs than ever before. Bold solutions are what we need right now, and PQC is proud to actively support this effort. Sugar-sweetened beverage reduction is a central component of PQC's workplace wellness campaign, known as "HOW-TO" (Healthier Options for the Workplace Today). One of its main pillars is bringing attention to what people are drinking and promoting healthier, less sugary options. It's important that both patients and health care workers understand how significantly their well-being can improve by making simple changes in their everyday lives.□

The Partnership for Quality Care (PQC) includes public, private, religious, teaching and nonprofit hospitals and integrated health systems as well as more than a million health care workers across the country. Members of the Partnership care for more than 45 million patients each year.

Opinion on Proposed Rule: For

Comment: Mayor Bloomberg is making a courageous and crucial move to counter huge distortions in our food system that allow for ever-cheaper and ever-larger sweetened beverages. The Mayor is clearly seeing the data on obesity/overweight, obesity-related healthcare costs and our intake of sweetened drinks and he is choosing to act on behalf of the citizens public health. Rather than reign in freedom, this initiative might help right the distortions in our markets that allow for the cheap, out-of-control portions that push consumers toward larger sizes. Thank you on behalf of our children- hopefully they will come to view sugary drinks as the treat they once were.

Rule: Article 81 - Food Preparation and Food Service Establishments

First Name: Risa Lavizzo-Mourey MD MBA President and CEO of Robert Wood Johnson Foundation

Opinion on Proposed Rule: For

Comment: Mayor Bloomberg's proposal to limit serving sizes for sugar-sweetened beverages takes place within an important context. We know that sugary drinks are one of the top sources of calories in the American diet and, therefore, a big contributor to the obesity epidemic among both children and adults. The Institute of Medicine recommended that business and government leaders adopt policies and implement practices to reduce overconsumption of sugar-sweetened beverages. RWJF agrees with that recommendation. The proposal to limit serving sizes of sugar-sweetened beverages is a creative attempt to achieve this goal. Scientific research shows that portion size influences how much people consume. The bigger the bottle, cup, bowl or plate that's in front of you, the more likely you are to drink or eat more. So this proposal is a reasonable approach that ought to be tested. The mayor isn't saying people can't drink 32 ounces of soda. But if they have ! to order a second 16-ounce drink to do so, it will be a more conscious choice. And it's going to take the combined effect of lots of small, healthy choices to get our country on the path to better health. New York City is one of the first places to show signs of success in lowering obesity rates among children, but the mayor and other leaders in New York and elsewhere know that there isn't a single, silver-bullet approach to reducing consumption of excess calories. The only way the nation will know if this new proposal will help to accelerate progress in preventing obesity is to try it and then evaluate the health and economic impacts.

Comment: The plague of obesity is not political, it's personal. Obesity is drastically reducing the longevity and quality of millions of lives at a monumental cost to their families, our city, and our country. The work of New York Road Runners is helping people find and embrace the joy of running and movement and to develop the overall well-being -- both physical and mental -- physical activity provides. We salute the Mayor and the Department of Health for their tremendous record advancing health, and for this important initiative to reduce the number of calories New Yorkers get through super size, sugary drinks that undermine good fitness.

Opinion on Proposed Rule: For

Comment: CAMBA applauds Mayor Bloomberg and the New York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene for taking a practical, no-cost attack on the obesity epidemic that is plaguing our city and our country. Every day CAMBA works to improve the quality of life for 45,000 New Yorkers, and it's clear that the communities we serve will benefit from common-sense regulations to help return normalcy to beverage sizes. Our Brooklyn Partnership to Drive Down Diabetes (BP3D) helps connect the nearly 10% of Brooklyn residents living with diabetes to nutrition and fitness options - and we're relieved that smaller-sized sugary drinks can help them make easier choices and live longer, healthier lives.

Comment: As a pediatrician working in clinical and public health settings, I have seen firsthand the effects that obesity has had on NYCs children. They are not only more prone to problems later in life, but are already suffering health consequences that are affecting their daily lives. My patients are suffering now from breathing problems during sleep time, some have joint diseases and other are suffering from severe psychiatric issues due to the stigmatization that goes on in school settings. We as a society are responsible to offer children the best future that they can possibly have. It is the first time in history that the next generation is in danger of having a lower life expectancy that the previous one because of the health effects of the current obesity epidemic. Curtailing the sale of supersize sugary drinks can have a huge impact on the health of our children and therefore allow them to live to their maximum potential.

Comment:	Mayor Bloomberg's proposed ban on the sale of large sugary drinks is an important step in addressing the health problems increasingly affecting New Yorkers. The city's clear commitment to improving public health is consistent with the mission of the CUNY School of Public Health at Hunter College, which is working to develop new approaches to alleviating asthma, diabetes, heart disease, obesity and other problems, particularly in disadvantaged neighborhoods that are disproportionately affected by these issues. All of us share a goal of encouraging disease prevention, advancing public health education, and reducing health disparities. On behalf of The City University of New York, I applaud the mayor's efforts to make New York City the leader in a much-needed national initiative to improve our public health.

Comment: We need to use all the tools at our disposal to counter the obesity epidemic, and local government has a major role to play. New York City's proposed ban on supersized sugary drinks is one way to give people the chance to decide how much they really want to consume, instead of letting industry make the call. It brings us closer to the norms of earlier decades, before obesity and diabetes rates began to skyrocket, when the average soda portion size was actually smaller than New York City's proposed limit. Public officials are charged with protecting our health and welfare, and New York City is taking a perfectly appropriate step to meet that obligation.

Comment: We salute Mayor Bloomberg on this initiative. In our work managing the care of 2.8 million children and adults enrolled in New York's public health insurance programs, we are very concerned with increasing obesity rates and the related health fall-out for our members and their families. Efforts like the Mayors sugary beverage initiative align with public health plans efforts to improve the health of the New Yorkers we serve, who face disproportionately high risk of obesity-related illness. This innovative policy is an important first step not only in its contribution to fighting obesity, but in the awareness it will raise and the other creative health promotion efforts it will inspire.

Comment: On behalf of the Pediatricians represented by New York Chapter 2 of the American Academy of Pediatrics, I would like to congratulate you on taking a courageous stand on sugar-sweetened beverages. Our members, which include pediatricians practicing in Brooklyn and Queens, support your efforts. The Academy of Pediatrics has been lobbying for changes involving sugar sweetened beverages so that parents can seek healthier alternatives for their children. We have also been involved in providing public education regarding portion size. We Pediatricians strongly believe that obesity starts even before birth, and may accelerate during childhood. Therefore we are strongly supportive of public health initiatives which can help reduce the intake of empty calories.

Comment:	I applaud Mayor Bloombergs proposal to ban large-size sugary drinks. Government has the responsibility not only to offer choices that improve health, such as primary and preventive care, housing and healthy food, but to limit access to choices that cause harm. And increasingly, it has the responsibility to address the soaring and unsustainable cost of health care. The Mayor addresses all three responsibilities simultaneously in a single initiative. Growth in obesity, especially among our children is alarming, as will be their future facing the consequences of diabetes, hypertension, heart and kidney disease, amputations and blindness, to name a few. The contribution of sugary drinks to this problem becomes clearer every day. The Mayor has charted a smart and courageous strategy for which he is to be commended.

Comment: The most important health concern about sugar intake is that it adds calories to the diet, which can be a ticket to weight gain and obesity. The calories we consume in beverages that contain sugar do not make us feel as full as when we eat the same amount of calories in solid food, so consuming large amounts of sugar-sweetened beverages or fruit juices can pack on the pounds. As you gain weight, fat can accumulate in your liver and reduce the effectiveness of insulin, the hormone that regulates blood sugar. Extra body fat affects the liver, and your pancreas works harder to try to keep blood sugar normal. Furthermore, whether or not youre overweight, consuming high amounts of sugar can increase triglycerides (blood fats) and increase fat production in your liver. Therefore, reducing consumption of high-sugar beverages is a good first step for maintaining a proper body weight and improving your health.

Comment: The health consequences of obesity and the contribution of sugar-sweetened beverages to the obesity epidemic have been well documented. There is also a substantial body of research indicating that the most effective ways to improve health is to target the upstream determinants of health rather than focus on individual behavior. The proposal to prevent the sale of large portions of sugar-sweetened beverages exemplifies an upstream approach. I have seen critiques of the proposal that assert that it will limit the ability of people to choose what they want to consume. However, this proposal does not target individual behavior - consumers would still be able to choose to drink as much sugar-sweetened beverages as they want. Rather, this proposal targets the way that sugar-sweetened beverages are packaged and sold. It is appropriate for the city to make policies to promote the health of the public.

Comment:	I believe that the Mayors proposal is highly creative and visionary and will be effective in reducing obesity. It is entirely justifiable to single out sugary beverages as a target for policy interventions. First, obesity has become the most important public health problem of our time. Second, sugary beverages are the single most important source of excess calories and sugar in our diet. Third, there is solid scientific evidence that regular consumption of these beverages contributes to obesity, diabetes, and heart disease. Forth, studies have shown that changing the food environment by limiting access to large portion size of soda is effective in reducing consumption, while education alone is not sufficient to change peoples behaviors. This proposal, if implemented, can improve the food environment, increase awareness about portion size and obesity, and reduce consumption in the population.

Comment:	I am disgusted that this administration thinks it has the right to tell me how much soda I can drink. This rule will not solve any problems. In 5 years when people are still fat, will you mandate exercise? Or what about requiring me to eat my daily amount of vegetables? While you are all sitting there thinking of new ways to take away our rights, schools are struggling to meet their budgets. Maybe if we fired half the bureaucrats we could use the money for their salaries to fund the schools. That will do more for obesity than any soda ban will do. Instead of investing in bureaucrats we should be investing in our children, and clearly you have no concept of that.

Mayor Michael Bloomberg
City Hall
New York, NY 10007
Att: Deputy Mayor Linda Gibbs

Dear Mayor Bloomberg :

We at the National Kidney Foundation applaud your efforts to combat obesity in New York City. As obesity reaches epidemic proportions in this country, many other deadly diseases are rising as well and kidney disease is chief among them. Currently, there are 1.3 million New Yorkers suffering from chronic kidney disease and that number is rising.

Most kidney disease is related to the dangers of obesity and diet that you are addressing or can be affected in a positive way by a healthier diet and an increase in physical activity. More than 90% of people who start dialysis do so because of kidney disease related to either hypertension, diabetes, or both. Prevention of these conditions will likely affect the under-recognized epidemic of kidney disease and the overwhelming costs that it exacts on human life as well as the health care system. Kidney disease affects one in nine Americans, yet most don't even know it.

Combating obesity may indirectly lower the risk of kidney disease through weight reduction resulting in less diabetes or better glucose control that means less end stage kidney damage. People with type 2 diabetes are at highest risk for kidney disease, yet a new study conducted by the NKF showed that primary care providers find and treat only about 10% of diabetics with kidney disease.

A more direct relationship exists as well. Recent research shows that sugary sodas result in a greater uric acid levels and these levels are associated with the development of kidney disease.

This association could help publicly support your proposal to limit soda size because it will help protect the kidneys while boosting overall health. One in three adults in the U.S. is at risk for kidney disease, yet the awareness level is low. Raising awareness is essential to really helping address the epidemic of chronic kidney disease that is tied in with the obesity scourge.

Once again, we commend your efforts. Please accept our offer to serve as a resource to you in any way we can. The National Kidney Foundation is a leader in the fight against kidney disease with a focus on awareness, prevention and treatment.

We are working to reach the 1 in 3 American adults at risk with important prevention messages before it's too late. We believe we can contribute to your initiative and would welcome the opportunity to schedule a meeting to discuss further.

Yours sincerely,

Joseph Vassalotti, MD

Comment:	Lisa M. Powell, PhD, Senior Research Scientist, Institute for Health Research and Policy. "Sugary drinks add empty calories to the American diet. Mayor Bloomberg's policy initiative to limit serving sizes of sugary drinks takes an important step forward toward the public health aim of reducing sugar intake and related obesity prevalence. Larger serving sizes are often offered with quantity discounts. This measure will help to eliminate these types of options which have previously incentivized people to consume excess quantities of sugar-sweetened beverages. This effort will also help society reclaim from industry healthier norms with respect to portion sizes."

Dear Ms. Bryant,

In response to the proposed amendment article 81 of the Health Code, relating to the maximum size of sugary drinks and self service beverage cups sold and offered in food service establishments, Community Board 15 takes the following position;

At the General Board Meeting on June 26th, 2012, Community Board 15 voted unanimously to reject the proposed amendment.

Community Board 15 believes that allowing this amendment to proceed would infringe on New Yorker's fundamental rights.

Although Community Board 15 understands the obesity problem that is associated with large size sugary drinks, it is an individual's right to choose and the decision should be left in the individual's hands.

If you have any questions please do not hesitate to call me at (718) 332-3008.

Thank you,

Theresa Scavo

Prevention Institute applauds New York City's proposed 16-ounce size cap on the sale of sugary drinks at restaurants, movie theaters, and food carts. This move demonstrates true leadership to promote health and protect against the worst practices of the good and beverage industry. Furthermore, New York City's proposed cap provides a model for communities across the country seeking to create healthier environments through policy change.

Sign on: Support NYC's Innovative Beverage Proposal

New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg proposed a bold move that would put public health ahead of corporate profits. If passed, food service establishments—including restaurants, fast food chains, and movie theaters – would be prohibited from selling sugar-sweetened beverages in serving sizes that exceed 16 ounces. At a time when the nation is facing unprecedented rates of chronic disease—and an ever-growing body of research is identifying sugary beverages as a significant contributor to this trend— this effort to create a healthier food environment is a strong step in the right direction.

Sign on to our letter to show your support for New York's beverage proposal. Join us in letting the NYC Department of Health know that we applaud their effort to both protect the health of New Yorkers and provide a model for other communities around the country.

We support and applaud New York City's proposed 16 ounce size cap on the sale of sugary drinks at restaurants, movie theaters, and food carts. Children and families deserve healthy options. The manufacturers and retailers of sodas and other highly-sugared drinks should no longer be able to pretend that a beverage over 16 ounces is a single serving. New York City has taken a position of true leadership by demonstrating the critical role good public policy can have in creating a food environment that fosters health and makes raising healthy children less of an uphill struggle.

The research on sugary drinks is conclusive: increased serving sizes lead to greater consumption, which has a direct relationship to chronic diseases such as diabetes, heart disease, cancer, and stroke – diseases that could be prevented. These same chronic diseases cause seven out of ten American deaths and account for more than 75% of our nation's health care spending. New York City Health Commissioner Dr. Thomas Farley is absolutely correct to say "government has a duty to respond to a crisis."

As public health advocates and members of the community dedicated to improving health and preventing disease, we stand with New York City in its efforts. Not only does this bold step protect the health of New Yorkers, it provides a model for other communities around the country to use local policies to counter the worst practices of the food and beverage industry and create healthier conditions for families to thrive.

Re: PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO ARTICLE 81

(Soda size ban)

I'm strongly against the ban so I sincerely urge you to pass it.

Why?

Because you'll piss off a huge number of people and the more people you anger the faster they'll clip your wings and then insist on the kind of government that's actually "of" the people, instead of over them, pressing down.

There's apparently no other way. Protesting to you is futile. Using logic is out of place. So the only practical answer is to hand you enough rope on the usual premise of where that leads.

As smart NYers, we're quick studies and you've taught us our lessons well. We've learned that our band of rulers doesn't give a damn what we think, and doesn't even think that we do. Or, on the off-chance that we do, we must be thinking the wrong things and stand in need of your firm correction.

After all, we're the same people who voted term limits. Twice.

We're also the same people who've attended your various "hearings" knowing fully that nobody listens. That your minds (which you consider a lot keener than ours) are closed and all your hearings are pro forma--a little hat tip to democracy-- a necessary but pointless concession to all the dolts.

We could, were we more naive about it, earnestly show you science that would skewer your rationale (and with citations from flashy Journals) but you've cherry-picked what you want and will reject any contradiction.

We could argue the nature of Liberty or Individual Choice but you actually believe that all of our choices should rest with you. That you, in your (greater) wisdom, should write the menus for everyone's life. And with the only multiple choices being A) "Do what we say" or else A) "Do what we say."

We could also bring up the point that you'll be dropping a giant dragnet, catching every fish in the sea-- the skinny ones, the jogging ones, the ones who buy larger sodas because they're cheap-er than buying small; because it lasts them the whole day; because a Super with two straws can quench the thirst of a couple of children. Or because-- and here's where your sphincters clutch-- because it's a source of pleasure. There are individual reasons why individuals do what they do. But you've discounted the individual.

This, once upon a time, was a city of individuals. Individuals made it vibrant. Individuals made it sing. But as you, step by step, reduce us to a kindergarten Collective, you destroy the soul of the city and make it, without a doubt, the most tedious place in the world.

So go to it. By all means.

Comment: The last time I checked I thought that I woke up in America. Where we have a choice and rights. If I want to have 44 ounces of soda I can. What gives you the right to take that away from me. Just another case of the government telling me what is good for me. I have an idea, why doesnt the government do something about the illegal immigrants instead of telling me not to drink large sodas. Big government equals big brother. Stay out of my business and just do your job.

Comment: I applaud Mayor Bloomberg's initiative as I believe he's one of the few people in power who is taking practical measures to fight obesity. We hear a lot about how we shouldn't be "nannying" people with laws about how they live their lives, but with such a massive problem as the obesity epidemic to deal with, we are way past the point where can trust people to make better choices. We have to help them make better choices. Good for Mayor Mike for putting the health of his citys people first and holding firm against the expected pressure from the food and soda industries.

Hello,

I am loving what you are doing in regards to the obesity crisis. There may be some negative backlash about this but it is all contrived and funded by corporations, it is not a grass root movement (Only marketers use QR codes, not everyday citizens like myself). Please consider myself a fan of this proposal and I hope to see it pass.

Comment:	I support the rule. Please dont be swayed by the lobbying of the companies that make money by selling these health traps! I support the ban on oversized sugary beverages and would support a move to include juice-based and milk-based beverages as well (which are actually more insidious as they give people a false sense of healthfulness). Proposed Amendment to Article 81

Sent: Thursday, July 12, 2012 10:34 PM
To: Resolution Comments

I am stating my opposition to Health Code Article 81, restricting sizes of soda sales, for it is another example of the hubris of Bomberg and his elite acolytes reaching into the minds and pocketbooks of this City's populace. The proof of this hubris is Bomberg's usual routine of skirting elected bodies of legislation and bringing his agenda to officials - appointed by him!

Whatever agenda or issues you are addressing, DOH and other governmental agencies are once again tampering with and impinging upon its citizens' rights and choices. Additionally, this article will further impact the already-troubled and harassed small business sector of our economy with more rules, regulations, inspections, and, of course, the ever money-making machinery of fines.

There is a real epidemic ongoing for years, and that is the pollution and proliferation of new rules, fines, and harassment by the non-elected officials of various bureaucracies aided and abetted by non-profit packs of social do-gooders. Their "non-profit" status, by the way, is funded by my taxes, for such organizations do not have to pay to exist as we working and middle class peons must.

How'se about paring down all the bureaucracies (with their pensions and benefits) and stop out-sourcing work to Pittsburgh and Newark (that I know of) by the Dept of Finance and bring these bucks and jobs to the City.

Comment:	This rule is more about government exercising undue control over the lives of citizens, rather than actually about combating obesity. There are many foods that contribute to obesity, and to pretend that this will put a dent in obesity is absurd. It is not the government that will solve the peoples problems, but the people that will solve their own, and governments problems.

Comment:	Obesity—along with its many perilous health consequences—is one of the biggest threats to the public's health worldwide, nationally and right here in New York City. Nearly half of the city's adults are overweight or obese, as are an alarming 40 percent of our school children.

At Columbia University's Mailman School of Public Health, where I serve as Dean, we are devoting increasing resources to studying ways to prevent obesity. Why prevention? Because we know that with obesity, it's far more effective than treatment.

A key to prevention is bringing calorie intake and output into a healthy balance. Sugary drinks are the largest contributor to excess calorie intake. Research by members of our faculty, including Dr. Y. Claire Wang, has demonstrated that reducing consumption of sugary soft drinks would greatly reduce the burden of obesity-related diseases and the cost of treating them. A 15 percent reduction in U.S. consumption, Dr. Wang found, could prevent 95,000 heart attacks, 8,000 strokes and 26,000 premature deaths over a ten-year period, while saving 17 billion in healthcare costs.

A body of additional research shows that portion size influences how much individuals consume. This is not merely a matter of personal choice: we are all influenced by our environment in ways that are difficult to self-regulate.

This is why I support the city's proposal to establish an upper limit to the size of sugary drinks served at food establishments within New York City. According to one analysis, reducing portion sizes from 20 ounces to 16 ounces could prevent New Yorkers from collectively gaining 2.3 million pounds in just one year.

It will take contributions from all sectors—government, academia, private industry, and foundations—to successfully address the obesity pandemic. New York City's proposed policy is an admirable contribution to this effort and one that could be carefully evaluated by scientists to guide future public health policy.

Dear Ms. Bryant:

I'm writing today in reference to the proposed amendment of Article 81 of the New York City Health Code. I appreciate that obesity is a public concern and that such a widespread health problem impacts everyone. I'm glad to see that the City wants to take steps to combat it. Government at its best creates spaces where people can lead happy, healthy, and fulfilling lives, and I'm proud to live in a city that actively promotes the health of its citizens.

That said, I believe Mayor Bloomberg's proposed beverage restriction misses the mark. A move like this, that limits our dietary choices, is both facile and an infringement on basic personal liberty. We will not be any better, wiser, or healthier for having one source of empty calories cut off by the force of law. Rather, we need to be empowered to make prudent, informed decisions about our own lifestyles. For this reason, requiring restaurants to prominently display caloric information on their menus was a great approach whose implementation I was pleased to see.

The mayor's current proposal, however, is alarmingly coercive and invasive. Again, the government's role is to provide a secure space for the exercise of our freedom. When the city starts trying to directly manage our diets or any other lifestyle choices, that free space is violated, and that threatens our community on a more fundamental level than the current obesity epidemic ever could.

I would gladly support other, less coercive programs to promote healthy lifestyles and informed decision-making. We should be aiming for more freedom, not less, and I honestly believe that we can find options that preserve our freedom from coercion as well as the freedom of good health. I hope that the City and the Board of Health will explore those options and abandon the current proposal.

Thank you for your consideration. I appreciate your attention in this matter.

Respectfully,

Jennifer Moakler

Comment:	While obesity and poor health practices are big problems, this does nothing to combat it. Someone ordered a large soda with their 20 piece nuggets, two cheeseburgers and large fries? Man if we outlawed that large soda it would really change things. Seriously, there are so many other things that can improve the problem. How about education? Teach people how to eat properly. This doesnt teach anything. If anything it hinders people because if they are in a situation where they need to make a healthy deciscion, they wont know how to choose since the government isnt telling them what to do. Of course the government might actually want that, so they have an excuse to increase their reach. And anyways, what about refills or buying three smalls instead of one? Most importantly, it is not the governments job to tell people how to live. Of course all of this is to be expected in the nanny state of the peoples republic of New York City.

Comment:	Rules and regulations are required in areas within society where guidelines are regulated to serve and protect the public. Attempting to control caloric consumption is unrealistic and, unfortunately doesnt work. As soon as you try to tell someone what they should or shouldnt consume for health reason, rebellious floodgates will be opened. External guidlines work for the short term, but fail to produce permanent habit formations needed for the life-long management of the individuals relationship with food.

Protect, Prevent, Live Well

The American Public Health Association (APHA) has long been concerned about reducing preventable disease among the American public, including chronic disease caused or exacerbated by obesity and overweight. As the problems have become clearer and more information has become available about the causes of the obesity epidemic, APHA is strongly supportive of comprehensive, evidence-based approaches to addressing the problem. What we know is roughly two-thirds of adults are overweight and nearly 36% of adults are obese. Among youth between the ages of 2-19, nearly 17% are obese.

There are many reasons that our population is obese, including increased consumption of unhealthy foods, increased portion size and less physical activity in daily life. One area of growing concern is the evidence linking sugar sweetened beverage (SSB) consumption to obesity and other adverse health outcomes. The increased consumption of SSBs is a problem among men, women and children of all ages, races and ethnicities. Despite the adverse effects of drinking SSBs, the consumption rate has more than doubled over the last 30 years, with the average American now drinking 45 gallons annually. During the 1990s, teens began drinking more SSBs than milk for the first time; today, 13% of teen calorie intake comes from soda. Forty-three percent of the increase in daily calories Americans consumed between 1977 and 2001 came from SSBs alone.

For each additional soda a child drinks daily, his or her risk of obesity increases 60%. Individuals who drink one to two SSBs per day are 27% more likely to be overweight or obese, regardless of income or ethnicity. Dental health is also negatively influenced by SSB consumption. Studies have found that soda consumption nearly doubles the risk of dental caries in children and increases the likelihood of caries in adults.

This is exacerbated by an increase in portion sizes of a variety of food sources. Studies show that people given larger portions simply eat more, without recognizing it. People given larger portion sizes of food eat ~20-50% more, without reducing intake at subsequent meals and when given beverages 50% larger, women consume 20% more and men consume 33% more, with no decrease in food eaten.

The 2010 Dietary Guidelines for Americans recommend reducing the intake of calories from added sugars and notes that the major sources of added sugars in the diets of Americans are soda, energy drinks, sports drinks (36% of added sugar intake), grain-based desserts (13%), sugar-sweetened fruit drinks (10%), dairy-based desserts (6%), and candy (6%).

All of the data outlined above makes very clear that we as a nation must do something to address not just the obesity epidemic but some of the root causes, including the increase in SSBs by Americans of all ages. The American Public Health Association believes that the approach being considered by the New York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene is a unique approach and we look forward to seeing what the health impact is. We have recently supported efforts in Congress that have called upon more research to measure how well public policy measures like this one improve health. As the information comes in, we will be one step closer to a better understanding of what works and what doesn't to prevent the array of health issues that SSBs exacerbates. Alone, it is not a complete solution to obesity prevention, but if successful, it will be one important bite out of the proverbial apple toward better health.

Comment:	I am a physician and want choice. If folks want a second 16oz beverage, I am for it. However, I am also in favor of a recasting the choice environment by modifying cues via size. Its innocuous and may be potentially effective. It merits study and I hope we proceed.

Subject: Statement in support of Mayor Bloomberg's sugary beverage proposal from the American Medical Student Association

Dear Press Office,

I'm writing to submit a statement on behalf of the American Medical Student Association in support of Mayor Bloomberg's sugary beverage proposal. Here it is:

" The American Medical Student Association applauds Mayor Bloomberg for proposing policy addressing the sale of oversized servings of sugar-filled beverages. We agree with the numerous experts who have stated that the proposed policy will promote the health of the people of New York and help to reduce rates of obesity and its related diseases. As physicians-in-training, we advise countless patients to make healthy diet and exercise choices for the prevention or management of conditions like obesity and diabetes. We also witness their struggle to consistently make healthier choices in a market that promotes the over-consumption of unhealthy foods and beverages through cheap prices, aggressive marketing, lack of access to healthier options, and inflated portion sizes. Research shows that larger portion sizes lead us to eat and drink more, and that this subconscious psychological effect is present even in people with a strong understanding of nutritional guidelines. We believe that living a healthy lifestyle should be supported rather than hindered by the environment around us, and that sound public health policies are the best way to create healthy environments. By ensuring that the decision to drink more than sixteen ounces of soda will be a conscious one, Mayor Bloomberg's proposed legislation will help to create conditions that promote healthy decision-making for everyone in New York."

Please let me know if there is anything else we can do to assist with this great cause!

Yours,
Molly Zielenbach

Comment:	While the intent of the rule is commendable, the rule itself is idiotic at best. Any reasonable-minded adult can make that choice for themselves. Any reasonable-minded parent can make that choice for their children and can teach their children to make the right choice in their absence. I do not consume sugary drinks for a variety of reasons but if I decide to one day, it is MY choice how much to consume. If one drink does not satisfy my desire then I will have another one--irregardless of its size.If half a drink is enough then so be it. It is not a choice that should be imposed on me. Please do not waste anymore of my tax dollars on a rule that addresses nothing but cost businesses millions to implement and hinders my right to choose.

Opinion on Proposed Rule: Against

Comment: Maximum size of 16 ounces for sugary drink offered in a restaurant is inscrutable. A 16 ounces juice is not enough for a adult at the time. When they purchase two cup of 16 ounces juice instead of one cup of 32 ounces juice, it is waste the foam cup which increase pollution of environment. People have rights to choose the way they live. Limiting the size of sugary drinks which can not limit the amount of sugary drinks they have drink in a day. And also, fruit juice is different with soda, they can not be limit in the same way.

Comment:	The ban on sweet beverages over 16 oz is a really bad idea. I never drink sweetened drinks, so this doesn't even affect me personally. But it's a slippery slope—and a really scary one. The freedom to make individual choices is a fundamental American value. There are a million unhealthy food choices one could make; do you intend to make them all illegal: pizza, danish, potato chips, fried chicken? Once you start on that path, where does it end? Is the next step to make a sedentary lifestyle illegal? Will regular exercise and stress-reducing meditation be mandated? You cannot force people to make healthy choices using legislation. The very idea terrifies me. I would support a mandate to offer smaller drinks as a choice. I have been in some venues where extra large drinks are the only option, and I wish smaller ones were sold. Mandating a smaller, healthier choice as one of many options is reasonable. Banning large drinks is not.

I think the mayor should worry about other things than what New Yorkers eat and drink. If the schools had less vending machines serving sugary drinks, and started with the youngsters, then maybe that would help the obesity problem. not forcing people to drink the way he wants people to drink.

Comment:	Not all people who buy large sodas drink the whole thing... many of them share the soda with others... and some like myself buy the bigger soda because the smaller one is just too small, and I will finish it before I am done eating.. and buying 2 sodas is too expensive, so I pay a little extra for the big soda, waste part of it so I have enough soda to last my entire meal.... but if that law goes into effect, I will either not have enough to drink with my meal, or I will have to pay more, which I cant afford... This new suggested rule, makes things more difficult.. just because a person buys a large soda does not mean they drink it all... MIND YOUR OWN BUSINESS...

Comment:	Each person has their own right to choose how much quantity to consume. Also to purchase another drink equally to 16oz will cost them more money. This total riduculous rule should be sqashed and maybe focus more on how to get the economy, wage fulfilment and more jobs back on track.

On behalf of Upstream Public Health, an advocacy organization in Portland Oregon, I would like to thank the Board of Health of New York City for your leadership on sugar sweetened beverage policy.

It is increasingly clear that sugar sweetened beverages are a uniquely significant contributor to the expanding American waistline and to our decreasing well-being and life expectancy. We believe that reducing consumption of sugar sweetened beverages is important for the public health and economic well-being of our communities and our country as a whole.

We are working in Oregon to decrease soda consumption by youth and adults, and we applaud New York's proactive approach. Thank you, and keep up the good work.

Comment:	Mayor Bloomberg, you are doing an amazing job. This drink law would start to revolutionize the industry and finally put a curb on the soda companies who are ruthless in their commitment to making money at the cost of our childrens health. Soda leads to diabetes and obesity, no matter how big soda companies want to spin their statistics. This puts an immense strain on our city and state healthcare system, bit peoplemore who are against this bill are toothe short-sighted to see that. Please continue to fight for us, thank you.

Comment:	Statement of Yael Lehmann, Executive Director, The Food Trust

The epidemic of childhood obesity requires bold and innovative solutions. With the average child consuming 500 cans of soda annually, Mayor Bloomberg's focus on sugar sweetened beverages is a logical target. While no single strategy will reverse the epidemic, a comprehensive strategy that includes reducing portion sizes is widely supported by public health experts. Even the soda industry agrees that their product should be enjoyed in moderation. However, the big gulp and other super-sizes deny the consumer the chance for moderation. Once they are purchased, excess sugar consumption is guaranteed unless you accidentally drop your soda on the floor. The Food Trust applauds Mayor Bloomberg's dedication to improving children's health through this smart and innovative public health policy.

To Whom It May Concern:

The National Consumers League (NCL) is the nation's oldest consumer advocacy group, founded in 1899 to protect and promote the rights of workers and consumers. As a group concerned about the obesity epidemic and the rising health care costs associated with the problem, NCL is writing in support of Mayor Bloomberg's proposal to limit the size of sugary drink that can be sold in New York City.

In this country, more than two-thirds of adults and one-third of children are either overweight or obese. As serving sizes have grown over the past few decades, so have obesity rates. Numerous scientific studies have demonstrated that sugary drinks, whether carbonated or non-carbonated, are a major contributor to obesity. Additionally, they are the single largest sources of calories and added sugars in the American diet. Countless studies document the role that excess weight plays in diseases such as type-2 diabetes, heart attack and cancer.

The Mayor's proposal to limit serving sizes to a still generous 16 ounces will help restore an understanding among consumers about what a reasonable portion looks like, while simultaneously cutting down on soda consumption and slowing the expansion of New Yorkers' waistlines.

While no single measure can be a perfect solution to the overwhelming problem of obesity in this country, Mayor Bloomberg's proposal is a strong start to addressing this problem. NCL encourages the Board of Health to vote in support of the Mayor's proposal to limit serving sizes of sugary drinks.

Sincerely,

Sally Greenberg

Opinion on Proposed Rule:	For
Comment:	Support for Mayor Bloomberg's proposal to restrict the sale of supersized sugary beverages larger than 16 ounces:

I am in support of Mayor Bloomberg's proposal to restrict the sale of sodas and other sugary drinks that are larger than 16 fluid ounces in food establishments such as restaurants, movie theaters, delis, and street carts. It would include the popular 20-ounce soda bottle from the corner deli and oversized fountain drinks available in fast-food establishments and movie theaters.

This campaign makes sense at a time when food portions have increased and so have rates of obesity.

Obesity is currently a major public health concern in New York City and is caused by an imbalance of energy intake (calories in) and energy expenditure (calories out).

Sugary, sweetened beverages are a major contributor to the current obesity epidemic. The mayors Task Force on Obesity states that Americans consume 200-300 more calories daily than 30 years ago, with the largest single increase due to sugary drinks.

As a researcher tracking portion size trends, food portions have increased steadily over the years, and so have the waistlines of Americans. We have grown accustomed to oversized portions, and we have come to expect them. My research found that portion sizes are now two to five times larger than they were in the 1950s. When McDonalds opened, for example, the only size soda available was 7 ounces. When Burger King first opened, the company offered a 12-ounce small and a 16-ounce large. Burger Kings small is now 20 ounces and its large is 42 ounces. I think it is time to return to those more reasonable sizes.

In a new paper co-authored with my NYU colleague Dr. Marion Nestle, and due to be published in the November issue of the American Journal of Preventive Medicine, portion sizes in the first decade of the 21st century continued to increase public health initiatives encouraging the food industry to reduce portion sizes. It is now time for action.
Large portions may contribute to obesity in several ways. They contain more calories than small portions. For example, a Small soda (which is 16 oz) at the fast food chain KFC contains 180 calories while the Mega Jug (which is 64 oz) contains 780 calories. This cup holds a half gallon of soda; it is far too much soda for one person. Indeed, it contains more than a third of the calories recommended for an entire day for certain segments of the US population.

Large portions also encourage us to consume more and to underestimate how much we are really eating. Sugar-sweetened beverages, in particular, provide no nutritional value whatsoever. As a registered dietitian counseling clients on healthy eating, I advise eating a small portion of foods low in nutritional value.

If food companies do not sell large sizes, consumers will not buy them.
Mayor Bloomberg is not banning the sale of soda. Nor is he telling consumers that they cant drink soda. Rather, he is calling attention to how much should be considered a reasonable amount to drink at a time. And 16 ounces is certainly more than reasonable -- that is a pint-size worth of sugar water. I do not see the proposal as a ban, but rather as an attempt to reset the norm for how much drink constitutes an appropriate portion.

This is a much needed proposal in an era of oversized portions.

As an educator and clinician, I would absolutely continue to advocate for better education and public health campaigns. The NYC health department found that 15 percent of patrons improved their choices by looking at calorie counts on menu boards. Indeed, we need to take this a step further. And Mayor Bloomberg is taking action.

Given the health consequences and enormous cost of our countrys obesity epidemic, it is time to return to eating less. And restricting the large sizes of unhealthy sugar-sweetened beverages is an excellent place to begin.

One suggestion however, for the mayor's proposal would be to extend the proposal to limit the sizes of ALL oversized fountain beverages marketed for one person, including those sold at convenience stores. This would include the Gulps and Double Gulps sold at convenience stores such as 7-Eleven, all of which are larger than 16 ounces.

Thank you.

My hope is that Mayor Bloomberg's important anti-obesity measures will create a dialogue and help educate people on the perils of overindulging on sugary drinks and the importance of healthy eating. This initiative has the potential to bring about change and encourage all New Yorkers to lead healthier lifestyles.

The GNYHA/1199 SEIU Healthcare Education Project strongly supports New York City's plan to ban the sale of large sodas and other sugary drinks at restaurants, delis, and other food service outlets.

This sensible measure will help reverse New York City's obesity epidemic, especially among children, and make the City healthier for everyone.

"There is no question that excessive soda consumption has helped trigger a dramatic increase in obesity and related illnesses like diabetes in New York City" said GNYHA president Kenneth E. Raske. "New York's hospital community applauds Mayor Bloomberg for taking an important step to improve the public's health."

"Banning the sale of large sodas and other sugary drinks will improve our health today and the health of future generations," said 1199/SEIU president George Gresham. "Dozens of studies have shown that drinking sugar-sweetened beverages is linked to increased weight gain and obesity, and thanks to Mayor Bloomberg's leadership, New York City is doing something about it."

Comments to the New York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene Re: Comment on: Article 81 – Food Preparation and Food Establishments

Submitted: July 16, 2012

The Center for Food Safety (CFS) is a national non-profit organization working to protect human health and the environment by curbing the use of harmful food production technologies. CFS works to protect our food, our farms, and our environment and promote public health.

Thank you for the opportunity to submit these comments in support of the New York City's proposal to set a maximum size on sugary drinks sold in food service establishments. We wish to make three main points: 1) the proposal is sound public policy; 2) this isn't about "choice" or other distracting rhetoric from the soda lobby; and 3) the soda lobby is showing its true colors by acting like Big Tobacco.

The proposal is sound public policy

Beverage sizes are out of control thanks to the combined efforts of the soft drink industry, fast food chains, movie theaters, and other purveyors of sugary drinks. At the same time, New Yorkers are suffering from diet-related chronic diseases. An impressive body of scientific evidence points to sugary drinks as a leading culprit in this public health epidemic. As a result, the New York City health department is well within its legal and policy purview to protect its citizens.

Considering that the health department is responsible for regulating all potential dangers at New York City food service establishments, this proposal is a logical extension of that authority. Sugar is similar to other sorts of contaminants controlled by the health department that can cause people harm. Moreover, the science is clear that people respond to smaller portion sizes by consuming less.

One of the most important tenets of public health is making the healthy choice the easy choice, which also means making the "default" choice as healthy as possible. This proposal is a first step to changing the environment to make reasonable sizes the norm. And at 16 ounces, the proposal is more than reasonable, especially considering that the original Coke size was 6.5 ounces.

This isn't about "choice" or other distracting rhetoric from soda lobby

The soda industry, because it does not have science (or even common sense) on its side, is resorting to methods of distraction such as claiming that this proposal is an affront to consumer choice, as if it is actually concerned about consumers. Of course, this proposal doesn't take anybody's choice away. New Yorkers who wish to consume more than 16 ounces are free to purchase more.

But let's take a closer look at the concept of choice. It is the soda industry that has taken away the choice of reasonable portion sizes. Nobody demanded larger beverages. Cups got larger and larger over the years because the soda industry (again, in coordination with food service establishments) realized it has a gold mine on its hands because with the cost of production is so cheap, industry can make a lot of money by pushing larger portion sizes, public health consequences be damned. This proposal is simply saying: enough is enough.

When the beverage industry and its cohorts use the word "choice," it's really code for threatened profit margins -- which are estimated to be as high as 90 percent for soft drinks sold through food service, as opposed to packaged beverages, which have additional costs associated with them such as bottling and distribution.

Without this common sense limit, it's not as if consumers will be free to choose. Instead, the soda companies will regulate exactly what portion sizes we get.

Big Soda is acting like Big Tobacco

While it's no surprise the soda lobby would fight any hindrance to sales, particularly disturbing is how their response is so similar to the underhanded tactics deployed for decades by the tobacco industry.

Big Tobacco wrote the book on distorting science as a way of confusing the American public and detracting from policy solutions. On a new website called, "Let's Clear It Up," the soda industry deploys this classic tactic of disinformation.

Among the "facts" the soda lobby wants us to know is that "drinking fluids is absolutely essential" and "we all need to ensure our bodies are properly hydrated." But with 410 calories and 113 grams of sugar, a 42-ounce Coke probably isn't the best form of hydration. The soda lobby also fails to mention how the caffeine in many soft drinks acts as a diuretic, meaning it can cause dehydration.

The tobacco industry lost any shred of credibility when it got caught telling outright lies, such as denying the scientific connection between cigarette smoking and lung cancer. Similarly, the beverage lobby claims that "soda isn't driving obesity according to the facts," conveniently ignoring numerous studies showing a clear connection between soft drink consumption and obesity.

Another tried and true tactic of the tobacco industry is inventing "grassroots" smokers' organizations, a strategy known as Astro-turfing (as in fake grass). It's a great way for companies that don't want their fingerprints on a controversial campaign to hide behind a front group. Such groups tend to garner public sympathy and support.

Enter "New Yorkers for Beverage Choices," a self-described "a coalition of citizens, businesses, and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose."

But as the New York Times recently exposed, this is a classic Astro-turfing campaign led by the American Beverage Association. The Washington-based lobbying group has retained powerful political consultants, including those behind the effective "Harry and Louise" anti-healthcare ad campaign from the 1990s.

Who made this list of alleged New Yorkers so concerned with their choices? For starters, other lobbying groups outside of New York, such as the Grocery Manufacturers Association, the International Franchise Association, the National Association of Concessionaires, the National Association of Theatre Owners, the National Restaurant Association and, of course, Coca-Cola and Pepsi-Cola.

Other listed supports of choice include restaurant chains like Chick-Fil-A, Denny's, and Darden Restaurants (owner of Olive Garden and Red Lobster, among others). Not quite the sort of grassroots activism members you hope for in a campaign about personal choice.

Additional Big Tobacco-style tactics we've been seeing from the soda lobby in response to New York's proposal include:

- Shooting the messenger and name-calling, by depicting Mayor Bloomberg as a "nanny" in full-page ads taken out by the industry front group, Center for Consumer Freedom, which not coincidentally, began with funding from Philip Morris and is run by notorious tobacco lobbyist Rick Berman;

- Claiming to take the side of small businesses because they know the public and the press have more sympathy for the little guy than multinational corporations such as Coca-Cola and PepsiCo;

- Claiming to care about the economic plight of poor people, never mind the fact that the soda industry targets these same populations with advertising designed to get them hooked for life on their unhealthy products;

- Threatening litigation to scare the City into backing down.

Ultimately, the tobacco industry lost all credibility with the American public (along with most policymakers) by engaging in such deceitful tactics. It seems now the soda lobby (along with their compatriots in the food service establishment) is heading down the same devious and doomed path.

In conclusion, the soda industry is running scared because they know the jig is up; that the public health crisis their products have helped create means that industry cannot keep enjoying the same unfettered regulatory environment. This common sense proposal will catch on as other cities take New York's lead. This is an idea whose time has come. Enough is enough.

Statement by Dr. Alwyn Cohall, Director, Harlem Health Promotion Center, Columbia University

"Mayor Bloomberg's proposed ban on the sale of large sugary drinks is a significant move in addressing the health problems that are devastating the lives of thousands of New Yorkers who suffer from chronic diseases related to obesity and overweight. The city's decision to improve public health is in keeping with the mission of the Harlem Health Promotion Center (HHPC) which is affiliated with the Columbia Mailman School of Public Health and funded by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC)--we are part of its 37-member Prevention Research Center (PRC) network. HHPC's GetHealthyHarlem.org consumer website is focused on supporting community members in learning about the chronic diseases associated with obesity and providing plain-language, educational information along with a platform for users to post their own health-related content. HHPC is also overseeing a research study, Project SHARE (Support for Hypertension Awareness, Reduction and Education), that is helping members of the Northern Manhattan community reduce their risk factors for hypertension through educational assistance that promotes behavior change around diet, physical activity, stress, tobacco use and many other key issues. Focused attention on life-style changes, including limiting intake of sugar-sweetened beverages (SSBs), is a critical component of hypertension control. On behalf of the Harlem Health Promotion Center, I support the mayor's efforts to reduce the consumption of sugar-sweetened beverages (SSBs) as an important step that many New Yorkers can take to reduce obesity and to promote their general health and wellness."

To whom it may concern;

I support the Bloomberg administration's proposed limit on the size of vessels in which sugar sweetened beverages may be sold for immediate consumption in New York City.

The framework of this proposed limit brilliantly mirrors other public safety efforts--and resulting laws--which are aimed to protect and better the lives of both individuals and the society in which people live. They have proved effective and do not impinge on personal liberty.

I liken the legislation to that of speed limits or seat belts: both reorient individual behavior in support of personal safety as well as the health of society as a whole.

Just as with driving a car - you can break the speed limit or opt to not wear a seat belt. However the risks and consequences of each of these personal choices put the individual in greater jeopardy, and will be more likely to impact others.

The proposed law is a message for consumers to pause and reflect: What risk am I taking by purchasing (and consuming) more than 16 oz of soda at a time? Why are we all being asked to refrain?

Personal choice is important, and some personal choices impact others. Obesity, diabetes and other chronic health problems caused by overconsumption are, unfortunately, our society's problems, ones we can't afford, and which mark society's future in other negative ways.

No individual acts alone in these choices.

Thank you.

Dear Tom:

Thank you for your continued leadership on so many vital public health issues, especially those that are related to the prevention and treatment of cardiovascular diseases and stroke.

I am attaching a copy of the American Heart Association's response to New York City's proposal to establish a maximum size for sugar sweetened beverages (SSB) in food service establishments. While the response and the rationale spelled out in the document provides additional details, I would sum up our response as:

> We support the adoption of the Health Department's proposal by the NYC Board of Health as a policy demonstration project contingent upon the inclusion of an adequate external evaluation of the initiative, which would address SSB volume consumption and any associated changes in caloric intake.

Your efforts, and the subsequent research and evaluation of the specific initiatives, has the potential to contribute to the body of knowledge and possible public policy interventions focused on obesity, one of the major modifiable risk factors for cardiovascular diseases and stroke.

The American Heart Association's Response to New York City's Proposal to Establish a Maximum Size for Sugary Drinks in Food Service Establishments (FSEs)

Summary of the New York City Proposal

In June 2012, the New York City (NYC) Department of Health proposed that the Board of Health establish maximum sizes for beverages offered and sold in FSEs. Non-alcoholic sugar-sweetened beverages would not be offered or sold in cups or containers (including self-service cups) that hold more than 16 fluid ounces. NYC defines a sugar-sweetened beverage as a carbonated or non-carbonated drink that is non-alcoholic, is sweetened by the manufacturer or establishment with sugar or another caloric sweetener, has greater than 25 calories per 8 fluid ounces and does not contain more than 50 percent of milk or milk substitute by volume or ingredient. The proposal does not include diet soda (except in a self-service cup since those cups, if larger, could be used to obtain sweetened beverages), unsweetened coffee and teas, alcoholic beverages, dairy drinks (>50% dairy), or >70% fruit and vegetable juices without added sweetener. The rule does not limit the amount of sweetener a customer may add to his or her drink and does not prevent customers from purchasing more than one 16 oz. drink. FSEs include restaurants, movie theaters, and family entertainment centers or parks , but do not include vending machines or drinks sold in many convenience stores, grocery stores, or corner Bodegas since the jurisdiction for these entities rests with the state of New York. The rule would take effect six months after adoption by the Board of Health and applies a $200 fine for each occasion that it is violated. Enforcement would be integrated into regular restaurant inspections.

AHA's Response

In response to numerous contacts and requests for comment on the proposed policy in NYC, the AHA has prepared this brief response. The United States is facing an obesity epidemic of historical proportion. More than 72 million adults have become obese and another one third are overweight.[1] Unfortunately, these numbers are spreading to our nation's children where 32 percent are overweight, 16 percent are obese, and 11 percent are extremely obese.[2] As partial but extremely important components of a comprehensive approach to the obesity epidemic, the AHA supports clinical guidance, programming, education, media campaigns, and policies that lead to a reduction in the portion sizes of the foods and beverages we consume.

The AHA is steadfastly committed to translating credible and robust science into public policy solutions for public health agencies and elected officials. This reliance on evidence-based policy imposes some limitations on unilaterally endorsing policy positions in emerging areas for which the evidence of the effectiveness of such policies still may be evolving or insufficient. In such situations the AHA may refrain from taking a position on an issue but will support on a case-by-case basis pilot initiatives to gather more evidence of the impact or efficacy of new policy initiatives. For example, the AHA has recently supported such policy evaluation pilots in the areas of limiting sugar-sweetened beverage (SSB) purchase within the Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program and the taxation of SSBs. The AHA strives to balance the need to support innovation in public policy with the responsibility to promote the adoption of proven, evidence-based policy solutions to combat problems such as the obesity epidemic.[3]

Given this, the AHA believes that it is important to determine whether limiting the serving size of beverages sold changes consumer behavior, lowers the consumption of SSB's and ultimately reduces the prevalence of obesity. We support the adoption of the Health Department's proposal by the NYC Board of Health as a policy demonstration project contingent upon the inclusion of a robust evaluation of the initiative to assess the health impact and determine whether there are any unintended consequences from this policy implementation. This evaluation must be conducted by a reputable and credible third party to ensure objectivity. Measured outcomes must include, at a minimum, consumer consumption trends for SSBs, changes in the prevalence of obesity, calorie intake across the population, the impact on diet quality and the assessment of any unintended consequences. Each of these measured outcomes should be stratified by age, ethnicity, and socioeconomic status. The evaluation should also include assessing FSE and the beverage industry responses and adjusted retail practices as a result of the initiative. Some of these measures would be short-term or interim and others (esp. obesity prevalence) would be longer term. Additional health outcomes to measure might include dental health and the prevalence of diabetes. The AHA is not endorsing, encouraging or supporting the widespread adoption of similar maximum size restrictions for sugary beverages in regulated food service establishments until such time as the initiative has been evaluated in NYC.

Rationale for AHA Response

Sugar-sweetened beverages are the largest single source of added sugars in the US diet.[4] Children and adolescents today derive 10% to 15% of their total calories from sugar-sweetened beverages.[5] Soft drink consumption is associated with lower intakes of milk, calcium, and other nutrients and an increased risk of several medical problems including diabetes.[6,7,8,9]

The American Heart Association recommends that no and low calorie beverages like water and fat free or low fat milk are better and healthier choices than full calorie sugar-sweetened soft drinks. Americans should limit the amount of added sugars in the foods they eat and the beverages they drink.[10,11] As part of the AHA's goal of improving the cardiovascular health of all Americans by 2020, the AHA recommends limiting SSB consumption to < 450 kcal (36 oz.)/week based on a 2000 kcal diet.[12] The SSB metric is one way in which the AHA will gauge the improvement in diet quality. Increase in sugar-sweetened beverage consumption has paralleled the rise in obesity prevalence.[13] Lowering consumption of SSBs, if not compensated for by other unhealthy choices, would help manage weight, lower the incidence of diabetes, and prevent displacement of more nutrient-dense foods in the diet.[6,14,15,16,]

Beverage consumption varies across age, sex, and race/ethnicity. In general, males consume more beverages than females, African Americans consume more fruit drinks and Caucasians drink more carbonated soft drinks than other race/ethnic groups.[17] At the same time, portion sizes for sugar-sweetened beverages have increased dramatically over the last several decades from original bottle sizes of 6.5 fluid ounces to the current default 20 oz. bottle today. Fountain drink sizes are often larger, with fast food restaurants, movie theaters, and convenience stores serving drinks in cups that hold as much as 42 and 64 ounces. Research indicates that people systematically underestimate the quantity of beverage and the number of calories with increasing serving size, based on an inherent inability to accurately determine volume in containers the size and shape of cups used for large portion size drinks.[18,19,20,21,22] At the same time, consumers do not feel as full when they drink beverages as when they take in the same number of calories in solid foods, and so do not compensate for this by eating less.[18] This can then lead to a systematic increase in calorie consumption and ultimately increased adiposity. Industry markets these drinks heavily to adults and children while intake of these sugar-sweetened beverages represents significant calories added to the diet with no nutritional benefit.

Conclusion

Consumption of sugar sweetened beverages has increased dramatically in recent decades and it is important for policymakers and the public health community to work together to identify, test and implement effective evidence-based strategies to help reverse this trend. The AHA supports the NYC Board of Health's adoption of the Department of Health's proposal as a pilot project contingent upon an accompanying and robust, third-party evaluation, as a means to determine if this policy has the potential to positively impact consumer behavior, reduce the intake of excess calories, improve diet quality, and eventually reduce the prevalence of obesity.

Comment: My comment on Mayor Bloomberg's proposed ban that would "prohibit the sale of any cup or bottle of sweetened drink larger than 16 fluid ounces," and would be applied in restaurants, movie theaters, stadiums, arenas and mobile food carts:

Research indicates that sugar sweetened beverage intake is a major cause of both childhood and adult excess weight and obesity, and that increases in portion sizes have contributed to these problems. Research also shows clearly that as portion sizes increase, people consume more. The proposed limits will simply make it easier for both children and adults to make a healthier choice.

The soda companies response to limiting portion sizes reminds me of the research we've done on Big Tobacco. Soda companies are mimicking all those tactics, trying to distract New Yorkers from the real issue: the excessive amount of sugar in their products, and that the more people drink, the more money Big Soda makes. But hiding behind front groups won't help this time. People have heard them proclaim they want to be part of the solution, but their actions say something else entirely.

Dear Members of the New York City Board of Health:

As a New York City business owner, I am writing to urge your opposition to the proposed city-wide beverage ban. I am a Pizza Hut franchisee owning 11 restaurant locations and employing 235 employees throughout the City. We will open 2 additional restaurants in 2012, and have plans for 3-4 more in 2013.

Rather than addressing consumption, this proposed regulation will instead limit customer choice and create unfair hardships within the foodservice community.

The application of this regulation to bottled beverages proves extremely concerning to establishments such as pizzerias. In many cases, pizzerias sell 2 liter bottles not for individual consumption, but rather family servings. Banning this sale will not only have an economic consequence for business, but deprive families the choice of purchasing bottled beverages with their pizza. Families should be allowed the choice of purchasing 2 liter bottles of soda, especially when they are then deciding in their home how much of the bottle to consume.

It is also unfair that this proposed regulation only impacts certain foodservice establishments such as mine. If you approve this regulation, you will leave unregulated a vast number of additional vendors such as convenience and grocery stores, whose sales are largely made up of beverages in excess of 16 ounces. It is discriminating that a customer will have access to a 2 liter bottle of soda while purchasing a pizza in a convenience store, but not be allowed to buy a 2 liter bottle of soda while purchasing a pizza at my restaurant.

Foodservice establishments are continuing to take great strides to offer customers broader menu choices. Customers however, should be allowed to retain the responsibility of making these choices for themselves. This proposal removes that responsibility and places it within government; that is not right. I respectfully ask that you oppose this regulation.

Comment:	Has there been any consideration that some people buy larger drinks, popcorn, etc to share at a lesser expense to the consumer?!! You can not believe that the government should be allowed to monitor what we eat and drink. We need to be informed but that should not give you the right to eliminate our choices. Where will this end, Im sure not at large sugary drinks!!

I make healthy choices for my child and myself. We go to the gym, we walk everyday and no one regulates what we can drink or eat. Has any thought been given to the amount of chemicals in diet drinks? The government should not be allowed to dictate our choices be it speech, drinking or eating.

We live on a street that the SLA (our government) allows 4 bars to be open until 4AM. I suppose drinking until you are drunk and disturbing the entire neighborhood is not a concern because thats a big money maker. It has been proven that lack of sleep endangers your health far more than obesity but we continue to allow bars to open on residential streets under the guise of its NYC. Explain the health benefits my children receive from 4 hours of sleep??!! You CAN NOT approve this piece of legislation.

The increasing consumption of sugar-sweetened beverages, including soda, fruit punches, sweetened tea, sports drinks, energy drinks and all other beverages with added caloric sweeteners, has been linked to increases in obesity and several chronic diseases, most notably type 2 diabetes, heart disease and cancer. The science is unequivocal on these links. Public health researchers have suggested that excess intake of these sugary beverages "may be the single largest driver of the obesity epidemic". The longest follow-up study showed an 83% increased risk of developing diabetes among women consuming at least one sugary beverage a day.

Obesity and diabetes are at epidemic levels in New York City. The proportion of New York adults who are obese (e.g. heavier than 192 lb for someone who is 5'7") has doubled since 1995, pretty much in parallel to the national trend. Currently, half a million New York City residents has been diagnosed with diabetes and an additional 200,000 have diabetes but are unaware of their condition. This means one in 8 New York City adults has diabetes. Diabetes and diabetes-associated heart and kidney diseases are among the leading causes of death, both nationwide and in New York. In New York City, close to 2,000 deaths every year are directly attributable to diabetes, the fourth-leading cause of death. Diabetes also imposes substantial disability—ranging from blindness, non-traumatic lower extremity amputations, to end-stage kidney disease that require dialysis—these consequences not only put a great burden on our healthcare system but the loss of quality of life and productivity has substantial implications on the local economy.

Let's think more about money from a taxpayer perspective. Each year, there are more than 20,000 hospitalizations with a principal diagnosis of diabetes in New York City. The cost of these hospitalizations, which reflects only a small portion of diabetes-related costs, amounted to $481 million in 2003. People with diagnosed diabetes on average spend more than twice as others on medical care. Each person diagnosed with diabetes is estimated to incur $6,649 extra per year on medical expenditure. Obese individuals spend an average of $1,443 dollars a year more than normal weight individuals, including increased use of inpatient (+$424/year), outpatient (+$448/year), and prescription drugs (+$574/year). The majority of these costs were on the tab of Medicare/Medicaid, which means taxpayer money. As a result of obesity and diabetes, many working age adults miss work, can't work, and/or receive unemployment or disability payments. And yes, it is largely preventable. In a city where we work hard so we can have a tiny apartment but in a fabulous city with the largest public transportation system and the best public parks and art scenes, a city that support its people to make healthier choices means less hard-earned tax dollars go into treating preventable diseases that cripple our workforce and consume our healthcare and disability budget.

Considering the proposed rule, first of all, how big is a 16 oz of sugary drink that is proposed as a cap serving size in food service establishments? It is one pound of sugar water, contains more than 13 teaspoons of sugar, delivers close to 190 calories, and, according to the beverage company's own label -- - two servings of beverages. The American Heart Association recommends that women take no more than 6 teaspoons of sugar and men no more than 9 teaspoons of sugar a day to protect our heart health. The cap on serving size in New York City restaurants to a 16 oz serving size is far from radical. Besides, the consumers are free to choose to purchase a second cup, and the restaurants/theaters are free to offer combo deals. Critiques may argue that these 'adjustments' will put a dent on the intended health impact—it may be true for some, but some others will simply cut back to smaller serving sizes. As we know, obesity is a problem of "a thousand paper cuts" --- there is no magic pill; every step towards nudging the citizens to make better choices for their health is a step towards the right direction.

Since the mid-1990s, children's intake of sugared beverages surpassed that of milk. Marketers spend close to $500 million dollars a year to reach children and adolescents with messages about SSBs, more than they spend on any other category. SSB consumption is highest among those New Yorkers who are most at risk for diabetes and obesity – those with low household incomes, living in low-income neighborhoods, and who are Blacks and Hispanic. Among New York City high school students, 31.6% of students in South Bronx schools consume one or more soda per day compared to 22.5% of students in less deprived neighborhoods. When the beverage companies propagate the theory that the proposed ban will hurt less advantaged families because now they have to pay a few cents more to buy more sugary drinks, it entirely lost sight of the fact that it is the poor dietary environment and marketing practices that results in higher chronic disease burden among the minorities and the poor.

It may be tempting to argue that these dire health consequences are the merely the problems of those who chose to drink large amount of sweet drinks or those who 'chose' to be obese. However that is entirely misguided. It is well recognized by the Institute of Medicine, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, as well as the World Health Organization that obesity is much more than about individuals' knowledge or will power – it is driven by an "obesogenic" environment that pushes large amount of cheap calories with little nutritional value on us, on our children. Educating consumers is a good concept, but it takes so much more than that. Research has shown that we are terrible at estimating portion sizes and calorie content. When the supersized option is the default option and has the 'value' price, it is not surprising that consumers buy the larger portions. In the case of young children, before age 5 or 6 they can't even tell commercials from the main program – we need to protect our children and teens by building an environment that's safe and healthy.

The infringement of consumer freedom argument seems obvious, and the so called "New Yorkers for Beverage Choices" campaign has been bombarding citizens with the message that "the ban sets a dangerous precedent by giving the City the power to make personal choices for us. If this is now, what's next?". The campaign is, unsurprisingly, paid for by the American Beverage Association, a trade lobby representing the largest beverage manufacturers and, obviously, profit driven commercial interest. The government is supposed to achieve things we can't achieve as individuals, and to do the right thing for its citizens even when it's unpopular. It is an illusion of freedom if our officials were to side with the large corporations. New York was the first in the nation to restrict trans fat in restaurants, and other states/localities followed. We were among the first to have smoke-free restaurants and other jurisdictions followed suit. We were the first to post calories in chain restaurants, and soon it will become federal law.

A cap on portion sizes of sugary drinks will help defend our youth and our poor from an industry that specifically targets them for profit and gives short shrift to health. Elected officials are charged with the ethical responsibility to protect the health of the public and reduce the disease burden of the most vulnerable among us. It takes little effort to cry 'unfair' but courage to confront a social default and take the right, though potentially unwelcomed action to put the health of one's constituents first.

Opinion on Proposed Rule: Against

Comment: Do you people have anything better to do? There was nothing stated about sugary drinks in article 81, all it talks about is mobile food vending. Can you please focus on more important issues in the city instead of making the restaurant owners more and more likely to leave the business because of constant harassing and pointless demands? If you care so much about peoples health you should make smoking cigarettes illegal and leave us alone!!!!

STATEMENT OF WORKING PARTNERSHIPS USA BY BOB BROWNSTEIN, RESEARCH AND POLICY DIRECTOR

Obesity has become one of the nation's most challenging health problems. If current trends are not reversed, today's obese children will become tomorrow's sufferers from multiple chronic diseases. Sugar sweetened beverages play a major role in creating an America of expanding waistlines.

Individuals do make choices about what to consume, but they do so in an environment dominated by easy access to fattening fast food and soda, by massive marketing campaigns, and, yes, by increasing portion size. A bottle of Coke once held 6.5 ounces of soda; a 32 ounce serving is nearly 500% larger. Despite global warming, it is unlikely that Americans are 500% thirstier than they were a few decades ago.

No single public policy will resolve the obesity problem. But multiple types of policy –public education, mandated labeling, regulation of ultra-large size servings, and more - can together have a decisive cumulative effect. All of these steps can help generate a major cultural shift- to the recognition that the individual is unlikely to successfully control his or her obesity without help in controlling a pro-obesity environment.

Mayor Bloomberg's proposal is a praiseworthy effort aimed at moving down a vitally necessary path to improve the health of future generations.

First Name: The American Diabetes Association

Email: kmaier@diabetes.org

Opinion on Proposed Rule: Other

Comment: The mission of the American Diabetes Association is to prevent and cure diabetes and to improve the lives of all people affected by diabetes. An epidemic of obesity and subsequent type 2 diabetes has engulfed the United States over the last several decades, in part fueled by the increased consumption of calorie-dense sugar-sweetened beverages (SSBs). At present, the Centers for Disease Control estimates nearly 26 million Americans with diabetes and 79 million with prediabetes. Excessive SSB ingestion leads to increased blood glucose and insulin levels and is associated with later development of type 2 diabetes. The Association has long been on record advising people with, and at risk for, diabetes to decrease or avoid consumption of SSBs. This recommendation is evidence-based and supported by randomized clinical trials, epidemiologic analyses and meta-analyses. Experimental evidence also supports the impact of larger portion sizes increasin! g caloric intake, and that eating or drinking from smaller containers reduces consumption of calories, even with unlimited refills. The American Diabetes Association supports reducing the consumption of sugar-sweetened beverages through public information and education, and public health policy.

New York City Board of Health
New York, NY 10013

Dear New York City Board of Health Members:

On behalf of the National Association of Local Boards of Health (NALBOH), I would like to encourage your Board of Health to take the necessary steps to protect the health of all individuals living in your jurisdiction. Your Board of Health has the responsibility to advocate for laws, policies, and ordinances that prevent death and disease.

Obesity rates for children and adults are growing at alarming paces. During the past 20 years, adult obesity rates have dramatically increased. Currently, over one-third of American adults and one-fifth of American children are obese (Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, 2012). Obesity can also lead to devastating health problems including diabetes, heart disease, cancer, kidney disease, and arthritis.

In July 2009, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) released a list of recommendations to prevent obesity. In the publication Recommended Community Strategies and Measurements to Prevent Obesity in the United States, the CDC recommended establishing and supporting state and local policies for individuals to make healthy food and beverage choices. Specifically, the CDC recommended state and local community policies to discourage consumption of sugar-sweetened beverages. This strategy references data that consumption of sugar-sweetened beverages among children has significantly increased over the past 30 years and is associated with a greater risk of obesity among children and adolescents (CDC, 2006).

NALBOH has adopted a position statement relating to nutrition, physical activity, and obesity and encourages all boards of health to adopt obesity prevention-related strategies that align with CDC's 2009 recommendations. Our organization supports your Board of Health in taking a similar public position on reducing the prevalence of obesity in New York City by establishing a policy for individuals to make healthy food and beverage choices. By taking this position as public health leaders and advocates, it sets a superior example and gives a strong recommendation for other boards of health across the nation to adopt similar stances.

I thank you for your involvement in this important public health issue. Please let NALBOH know if we may be of any assistance as you move forward in your work on other public health concerns.

Sincerely,

Steven F. Scanlin
NALBOH President

Rule: Article 81 - Food Preparation and Food Service Establishments

Opinion on Proposed Rule: Against

Comment: The proposed change would not affect Barbetta because we are an upscale elegant restaurant and do not serve large soda bottles. But the proposal is absurd for other venues because anyone can simply order 2 smaller bottles and still drink more than 16oz. of sugary soda. And they can still buy the larger bottle in supermarkets and grocery stores. My husband, Dr. Gunter Blobel who is at the Rockefeller University is one of New Yorks Nobel Prize winners in Medicine, so Barbetta is very much into healthy dining and drinking. Our menu, as a matter of facts states that "Our dishes are prepared with very little salt." and that "Our desserts are made with very little sugar." Prohibiting consumption of large sodas is not going to curb obesity. Educating the public is the way to go.

Comment:	Recommended requirement: Eight ounce (standard beverage single serving size) be available at a per ounce price equal to the lowest per ounce price available for any serving size.

Rational: This provides for a single serving option to be available. It also removes the financial motivation to order a larger size than desired to take advantage of reduced per ounce saving.

Dear Ms. Gibbs,

> We think what you're doing for our city with the mayor is fabulous and share your passion for the health of New Yorkers. You can read more about our passion in the letter below written to Mayor Bloomberg. Can you please pass it on to him? We hope you will also add your support.

Michele Risa

Dear Mayor Bloomberg,

Words can't express how grateful I am to you for all you've done to humanize this great city.

I now can enjoy Manhattan on foot or bike after it's been held hostage by taxis, cars, buses and trucks for decades. As a small business owner, I especially appreciate commuting to my clients by bicycle which saves time and money, burns calories, lowers my carbon footprint and last but certainly not least, enables me to feel like a happy tourist as I ride down our spectacular Broadway.

As you have said, obesity is "one of the biggest problems this country has." I share your passion. To help combat this epidemic, I invite you to sign my petition to the FDA. Here's why.

Currently the FDA requires food labeling to be in grams. But most Americans don't understand the metric system! By converting grams to teaspoons, Americans will have a better grasp of how much sugar they are consuming.

Therefore, we are asking the FDA to add the number of teaspoons of sugar to the per serving "Nutritional Facts" on the side of the package as well as for the whole package by adding a label on the front.

Just as you helped New Yorkers know how many calories they consume by mandating that restaurants post the amount of calories contained in menu items, knowing how much sugar we consume is another step towards reducing our huge health costs.

I hope you will consider adding your support to our petition as a way of continuing to battle obesity on multiple fronts.

Thank you in advance,
Michele Risa
Michele Risa

P.S. I also love Summer Streets in August and can't wait to see our bike lanes filled with 1,000s of people as a result of your "New York City Citigroup Bike Share."

P.P.S. I applaud your current work on banning soda larger than 16 ounces. Would you like to start a petition together?

The Coalition of New York State Public Health Plans (PHP Coalition) is pleased to provide the following statement of support for New York City's proposed limit on the size of sugary beverages:

We salute Mayor Bloomberg on this initiative. In our work managing the care of 2.8 million children and adults enrolled in New York's public health insurance programs, we are very concerned with increasing obesity rates and the related health fall-out for our members and their families. Efforts like the Mayor's sugary beverage initiative align with public health plans' efforts to improve the health of the New Yorkers we serve, who face disproportionately high risk of obesity-related illness. This innovative policy is an important first step not only in its contribution to fighting obesity, but in the awareness it will raise and the other creative health promotion efforts it will inspire.

Information about the Coalition:

Established in 1995, the Coalition of New York State Public Health Plans (PHP Coalition) is an important voice for New York's nonprofit, publicly-focused health plans and the low-income people they serve. The Coalition currently represents 9 plans serving 2.8 million individuals, about three-quarters of all of the children and adults enrolled in New York's Medicaid managed care, Family Health Plus, and Child Health Plus programs. Sponsored by or affiliated with public and not-for-profit hospitals, community health centers, and physicians, Coalition plans offer decades of experience in delivering high-quality services to members who often, otherwise, experience significant barriers to health care.

New York City DOHMH,
How does this proposed rule affect 100% crushed fruit smoothies? We have many health clubs in NYC that sell 20oz 100% Natural Crushed Fruit Smoothies both with and without protein added. These drinks are formulated for healthy lifestyles and muscle recovery after a workout. However when I look at the stipulations in this proposal I cannot tell if these would fall under the "sugary drink" classification.
While there's no added sugars in these drinks, fruit by its very nature has sugar in amounts exceeding the 25 calories per 8oz. I would hope that this proposal would have addendums to allow for healthy options such as what our clients offer, since the purpose of this proposal is to promote healthier lifestyles, healthier choices and healthier New Yorkers!

Please inform me on how to proceed with our NYC clients to make sure they are compliant.

Thank you,

Oregon Public health Institute supports Mayor Bloomberg's proposal to limit the size of sugar drinks in food service establishment. We know that sugar drinks are the a large driver of obesity, and portion sizes of sugar drinks have increased tremendously in the last 20 years. This will be a great step forward in normalizing portion sizes and is an inspiration for other local governments. Bravo mayor Bloomberg!

Comments on sugary drinks

After working with the youth for 3 years I realize that education is the key proponent to change. Therefore if you are going to legislate the size of sugary drink, education must be included.

Dear New York City Board of Health,

As a Master's student at Columbia University in Health Policy and Urban Planning with a focus on childhood obesity, I strongly support Mayor Bloomberg's proposal to limit the size of SSBs to 16 ounces. The impacts of the food environment on children and adults' health and weight are widely documented; increased access to affordable healthy foods and decreased access to cheap, unhealthy foods are key to tackle the epidemic.

Obesity must be addressed by policies on all fonts - built environment, food access, education, etc, and this proposal is an important step toward a more healthy New York City, which, like the rest of America, is currently burdened by serious health disparities. I urge you to approve the proposal.

Sincerely,

Jess Liu

This proposed amendment should include alcoholic sugary drinks such as, but not limited to, a margarita. . If only "soda " is targeted then only the "poor" is the target group. Why should anyone be allowed to order a 20oz alcholic beverage or an extra large beer? it in not only bad for your health but most of the time its dangerous to the people around the drunk who decided to drink all those calories and decided to get in a car or pick a fight.

Would this proposed amendment also include diet soda as well?

I think people should not drink soda, its terrible for you and I never had it in my home, however, Alcohol consumption is a big problem too especially when people go out and drink 2000 calorie alcohol drinks. Pitcher of margaritas any one? ALL sugary beverages should be regulated not just soda at a bodega or McDonald.

Dear New York City Board of Health,

As a joint degree student at Harvard Law School and Harvard School of Public Health, I see both the legal rationale and the public health imperative behind Mayor Bloomberg's proposal to limit the size of soda and similar sugar-sweetened beverages sold. Soda companies profit signficantly from marketing directed at less educated, low-income individuals, and profit even more from the cheap production of large quantities of their beverages. People think they are getting a "deal" when they pay $1 more for double the amount of soda at a movie theater or convenience store, but the soda companies are actually profiting from this while the consumer is only getting double the amount of empty calories, chemicals, and food dyes.

Because soda companies are predatory, because they target low income communities, and because our health care system cannot continue to take on the costs associated with overconsumption of sugary beverages, this Board must act to approve the Mayor's plan.

As a city that is the trendsetter for bold, positive policy change related to food access and public health nutrition, New York City should take the next step and curb soda companies' ability to profit off our our residents and health care system.

Sincerely,

Ona Balkus

Comment:	This ruling will not stop over consumption of sugary drinks. Persons that want more than 16 ounces of beverage will order more than one beverage. This will increase waste and have a negative impact on the environment, as well as making more waste that may be discarded on the street instead of in approved containers. The biggest impact you can have on restricting sugary drinks is banning them in public schools and replacing Coke (etc.) machines with water and/or juice machines in public parks. You could also try setting an age restriction on selling caffine.

I don't often agree 100% with our political representatives but this time I must admit, the Mayor is 100% correct. If the public would stop and think, the Mayor is not trying to take away your freedom of choice; he is merely saying no more than 16 ounces can be purchased in a public eatery at a time. You want more than 16 ounces? You buy another!

If those who are so concerned about what someone says with reference to what they can eat and how much they can drink, should check into the matter and educate themselves on the dangers in consuming too much sugar, which, by the way, is a contributor to Diabetes, they too would back the Mayor.

This is just my opinion.

Dear New York City Board of Health,

Mayor Bloomberg's plan to curb soda sizes in New York City is foolish and naive. This plan will not stop people from drinking large amounts of soda, or stop people from drinking soda at all. The limit is easy to circumvent by buying multiple sodas. It's not as if soda is the only sugary food product we consume, as well. People are free to consume equally sugary (although mildly healthier) fruit juices at whatever size they choose. We're also free to go down to Popeye's and eat a whole bucket of chicken, buy a package of bacon from the market and eat it in one sitting, devour a large bucket of popcorn at the movie theater, and so on.

In short, I can't believe you don't see the problem behind this bill. It's so narrow-minded and ridiculous; curb soda sizes and people will magically become skinner, when that isn't what's going to happen at all. People need to make better eating choices across the board and exercise regularly. Lifestyle changes are what will curb obesity. Regardless, I don't want the government making these choices for me. Just as I don't want them telling me who I can marry, or what I can do with my body, I don't want them telling me what I can eat or drink either. (Besides; I seem to be doing fine without their help, since I'm actually almost underweight for my age.)

Mayor Bloomberg should really consider the actual effect of his bill, and whether anything positive will come of it, other than wasting more plastic drink cups.

Oppose the Mayor's Beverage Proposal Over-reach

Diane H Fabian [dhfabian@gmail.com]
Sent: Thursday, July 19, 2012 12:33 PM
To: Resolution Comments

Dear New York City Board of Health,

I am writing in opposition to Mayor Michael Bloomberg's proposal to limit the size of soda and similar sugar-sweetened beverages sold in restaurants, movie theaters and food carts to 16 ounces.

This stirs up a foolish controversy that is more likely to be counter-productive. Instead of giving a message about obesity, the message that the public hears is about government over-reach. Logically, if one wants more than 16 oz of a soft drink, he'll simply buy a second drink, so the obesity issue remains unaddressed. What people oppose is government taking another step to dictate their personal choices. There is always a crowd who goes gung-ho when it comes to telling government to dictate the personal choices of others. Those who don't smoke, for example, order government to block others from smoking -- even when they, themselves, cause far more of a public threat by driving, burning fossil fuels (the actual leading cause of breathing-related disease). Those opposed to caffeine wage anti-caffeine campaigns. We have a myriad of campaigns opposing everything from french fries to TV, meat to milk, internet use to pets.

The more opposition to a product, the more likely people are to want that product. The key is education, not nannyism.

I'm not sure why this generation assumes that it is necessary for government to dictate personal choices (for everyone except themselves). I do know that growing up is a process of learning to make personal choices and those choices require the learned skill of saying "No" to our wants. Self-discipline is a vital survival skill that cannot be developed in a climate where personal choices are made for people. That said, education is the key to enabling people to make the best choices for themselves. Instead of trying to ban soft drinks over a certain size, launch an organized and informative campaign (not one that merely bashes people for failing to toe the line) to encourage them to make healthier choices. Positive campaigns (as opposed to dictates) are far more successful, having an impact of the personal choices one makes over a lifetime.

New York is one of the greatest cities in the world, and you have a duty to maintain its tradition of defending the freedom of personal choices. Mayor Bloomberg's duty is to work to resolve the crushing issues that actually destroy lives, such as poverty and violence, stressing the reality that "We're all in this together." I would STRONGLY urge Mayor Bloomberg to focus on a campaign centered on bringing people together, encouraging them to reach across all the cultural barriers that we have invented while discouraging the tribal urges that set groups of people against each other on the basis of such comparatively insignificant issues as one's diet, reading preferences, etc., etc.

Sincerely,

Diane H Fabian

Dear New York City Board of Health,

Only an elite mayor out of touch with the people would suggest this. Most affordable restaurants have free refills so the cup size is irrelevant to the quantity consumed. Also, the choice of diet, sugar, or even water is up to the customer at the last moment, AFTER paying.

This is just stupid. If you want to fight for people's health, there are so many more useful things to go after. Slap a warning sign up so people know the risks and go after assuring there are public restrooms everywhere so bodily functions don't leave disease in the streets and alleys.

I find it most disturbing that Mayor Bloomberg is attempting to tell us, the consumer, what size soft drinks we can purchase. Does the Mayor really feel that a 32 oz. drink of Coke or Pepsi is to blame for any possible health crises? How about instead of this meanlingless assault the city look to EDUCATING the general public on any all aspects of staying in shape, cutting calories, etc. Does the Mayor really believe that by slashing soda sizes that the city will save money from rising health care? Has he or anyone thought of the negative impact this will have on the city. Let me give you an example, my family and I live in NJ and we like coming over to NY to go to the movies and watch sporting events. Obviously this is not cheap for us to do, so to save some money we will often buy one large size drink at the theatre or game and share it. Now you explain to me how I am suppose to share a 16 oz drink (with no free refills available) with my wife and child? I tell you how I will do it, I will stay in NJ and so will my money- you want bottom line, think tax money that the city will lose. I will not cross that border into NYC if you pass that ridicoulus soda law and neither will my wallet.

Ban on Drinks over 16 oz

Hello,

I do not agree with the proposed ban on drinks over 16 oz not only because I work for a movie theatre but because my husband and I see many, many movies and go to baseball games and make road trips. We always buy the largest soda possible and share it over the course of a couple of hours. We choose diet drinks however that doesn't matter as they will be banned as well. It doesn't seem right for the local government to make that decision to dictate what quantity of food and drink a person can consume. What is next, a ban on selling multiple hamburgers to one person? The person in line at McDonalds ordered two quarter pounders with cheese and a big mac. I would think that has a worse impact on his body than the 32 oz soda he purchased with it.

Please do not follow through with this ban.

Thank you,

Melissa Windham

Statement in support of the soda portion limit proposal from Public Advocate Bill de Blasio:

"As a parent, I know that every time my kids walk down the aisle at our neighborhood deli they are confronted with more bad choices than good ones. It's an uphill battle that is taking a terrible toll on families across this city—and no one will pay a higher cost than our children if we fail to act. Mayor Bloomberg understands that we are losing the fight against obesity and it is time for a new approach. I commend the Mayor for recognizing this public health crisis and taking it head-on."

Montefiore Supports the Large Serving SIze Ban

Nicole Hollingsworth [NHOLLING@montefiore.org]
Sent: Thursday, July 19, 2012 3:03 PM
To: Resolution Comments

Montefiore supports the Mayor's proposal to ban the sale of large serving size (greater than 16 oz.) of sugar sweetened beverages and non-diet soft drinks in New York City.

As President and CEO of Montefiore, an innovative academic health system serving more than one-third of the 1.4 million New Yorkers living in the Bronx, it is my job to ensure that Montefiore takes meaningful responsibility for the well-being of our community.

The obesity epidemic is nothing short of a national health crisis.

The Bronx has for so long been disproportionately affected by poverty and illness and with the twin epidemics of obesity and diabetes, the challenges are huge. Of the 62 counties in New York State, the Bronx is consistently ranked last in health status and the children here are hit hardest. Over 43% of children in the Bronx live below the federal poverty level and 1 in 3 are obese.

A few years ago, we took a stand against the prevalence of sugary beverages in our community. We knew our children were vulnerable to the aggressive marketing of low nutrition high-calorie drinks. At the Children's Hospital at Montefiore we are seeing what used to be called adult-onset diabetes in children and teens. The disease has changed and if we fail to respond, our youth are at risk. We must intervene to protect the next generation. This proposal to regulate the portion size of sugary drinks could not be more important and timely.

Our goal is a comprehensive regional approach. To that end, we are partnering with Dr. Farley and the Department of Health on creating "Health Promotion Zones"—where we seek to improve the health of the community through alliances with small businesses, faith-based groups and other community providers. For the past 10 years, Montefiore's School based health program has been in the forefront of fighting obesity in partnership with the Departments of Health and Education – serving over 20,000 children across the Bronx. And on all Montefiore campuses, we removed sugar water and trans-fats from our food services.

Good healthcare can only do so much. The right policies are needed to make a difference. With the proposed regulation of the portion size of sugary drinks, we are poised to make more profound and lasting structural change. We need to see clearly down the path of protecting our children. With so much political gridlock, our Mayor is stepping up to act—to achieve real gains for the public's health and crucially, for the health of our children.

Comment:	Scientific research is coming out and building the evidence base that, the more we serve people, the BIGGER the serving size, the more we eat. The research also shows that the more calories you take in, relative to those you burn off, the more that is stored as EXCESS fat.

At the same time, the market research is out that the larger the portion, the more money/profit that is made. The implementation AND enforcement of this bill, along with the tracking and monitoring of the impact of this bill will a much better answer. On the face value, what is the risk and what is the harm? For the people: Normal weight as well as overweight and obese individuals consumes less of these, perhaps some of them loss weight, some dont gain weight, and some slow down how much they gain. These are all good outcomes. For the industry, they make lots of money only selling normal sizes beverages. As opposed to people being exposed to HUGE portions, continuing to drink them and continue to gain excess weight. At the same time, the Industry makes LOTS AND LOTS AND LOTS of money selling super size portion. For a 1-2 yr implementation, tracking and testing window, this policy is well worth it.

New York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene
2 Gotham Center, 3rd Floor, Room 3-32
42-09 28th Street
Long Island City, NY 11101-4132

To the Department of Health and Mental Hygiene;

We, the Committee for Hispanic Children and Families, Inc. (CHCF), do stand in support of Mayor Bloomberg's proposed amendment to Article 81 of New York City's Health Code, as a component of the New York City Obesity Task Force's plan to prevent and manage obesity. In addition to reducing obesity, the plan also aims to promote physical activity and better nutrition, address disparities between communities, and diminish preventable health conditions along with the healthcare expenses they incur. While the idea of limiting the portion sizes of sugary drinks sold in food service establishments does raise some concerns, the city's growing prevalence of obesity is equally, if not more, alarming.

We understand that recent statistics indicate that "More than half of New York City adults (58%) are overweight or obese and nearly 40% of New York City public school students in grades K-8 are overweight or obese (www.mikebloomberg.com)." We also recognize that this crisis has put New Yorker's at higher risk for heart disease, cancer, diabetes, etc. Furthermore, one can not ignore the facts that approximately one third of a New Yorker's daily caloric intake comes from food service establishments rather than food purchased and prepared at home, or that beverage portion sizes in such establishments have risen dramatically (E.G. 457% at McDonald's since 1955), or that sugary drinks make the largest contribution to the amount of added sugar consumed by the average American. Often unwittingly, New Yorkers consume hundreds of calories per day by purchasing large sugary beverages, which is particularly concerning for NYC's Latino children and families, given the frighteningly high rate of consumption of sugary drinks throughout minority and low-income communities. Recent rates of overweight and obesity show that Latinos have surpassed the general population by ten percentage points, with the highest prevalence of any ethnic group in the State of New York. Alarmingly, 28.3% of Latino males, 31.3% of Latino females and 31% of Latino children in New York City are obese. Non-coincidentally, the New York Times reports that "among people under the age of 40, Hispanics are four times more likely as whites or Asians to have [diabetes]," and rates of obesity continue to rise.

In response to these concerns, CHCF has been working for many years to prevent obesity through its Healthy Living Program in the Bronx. At CHCF, we found that a culturally based program combining nutrition, exercise, and stress-relief techniques to provide families with skills they can use to prevent obesity works in our communities. The program works with whole families, creating opportunities for family bonding and strengthening relationships, while also creating a shared understanding of nutrition and fitness in the family that will reinforce healthy choices. Participants also learn tips that promote healthier food choices, compatible with the lifestyle and cuisine of Latino families. The curriculum uses cultural traditions and values, such as: traditional foods, promenading in the plaza, Latino seasonings, and dancing.

CHCF commends this effort to address the issue of obesity, but also cautions the Department of Health and Mental Hygiene, as well as the Mayor's Office, regarding the potential for overregulation should such amendments become more common. We call upon the Mayor to support more community-based and culturally sensitive initiatives to encourage New Yorkers to make healthier choices.

Sincerely,

NYC Department of Health and Mental Hygiene
Public Hearing: The Proposed Amendment to Article 81- Food Preparation and Food Service Establishments (the "Sugary Drink Portion Size" Proposal)
July 24, 2012

Testimony of The Committee for Hispanic Children and Families, Inc.

Good afternoon. My name is Vanessa Ramos, Senior Director for Policy at The Committee for Hispanic Children and Families (CHCF). CHCF was founded in 1982 as a voice for the Latino community in child welfare, and now develops programs and advocacy initiatives that respond to the needs of Latino children and families in New York in child care, early education and youth development.

I want to thank the NYC Department of Health and Mental Hygiene for giving us the opportunity to testify regarding the proposed amendment to Article 81 of New York City's Health Code and its possible impact on New York City's Latino families.

I will be discussing: the importance of implementing this amendment as a part of a comprehensive overweight and obesity prevention plan, CHCF's understanding and support of the city's initiative to reduce rates of overweight and obesity, and the ways in which the city's Latino community is being effected.

I. CHCF's Support of NYC's Anti-Obesity Campaign

CHCF supports Mayor Bloomberg's proposed amendment to Article 81 of New York City's Health Code, as a component of the New York City Obesity Task Force's plan to prevent and manage obesity. In addition to reducing obesity, the plan also aims to promote physical activity and better nutrition, address disparities between communities, and diminish preventable health conditions along with the healthcare expenses they incur. While the idea of limiting the portion sizes of sugary drinks sold in food service establishments does raise some concerns regarding the level of government regulation of personal choice, the city's growing prevalence of obesity is so alarming that it deserves significant attention in the form of this proposed amendment.

Recent statistics indicate that "More than half of New York City adults (58%) are overweight or obese and nearly 40% of New York City's public school students in grades K-8 are overweight or obese (www.mikebloomberg.com)." We also recognize that this crisis has put New Yorker's at higher risk for heart disease, cancer, diabetes, etc. Furthermore, one can not ignore the facts that approximately one third of a New Yorker's daily caloric intake comes from food service establishments rather than food purchased and prepared at home, or that beverage portion sizes in such establishments have risen dramatically (E.G. 457% at McDonald's since 1955), or that sugary drinks make the largest contribution to the amount of added sugar consumed by the average American. Often unwittingly, New Yorkers consume hundreds of calories per day by purchasing large sugary beverages, which is particularly concerning for NYC's Latino children and families, given the frighteningly high rate of consumption of sugary drinks throughout Latino, African-American, and low-income communities.

II. CHCF's Experience Addressing Overweight and Obesity

In response to these concerns, CHCF has been working for many years to prevent obesity through its Healthy Living Program in the Bronx. At CHCF, we found that a culturally based program combining nutrition, exercise, and stress-relief techniques to provide families with skills and knowledge they can use to prevent obesity works in our communities and make sensible and nutritious choices for themselves and their families whenever possible. The program works with whole families, creating opportunities for family bonding and strengthening relationships, while also creating a shared understanding of nutrition and fitness in the family that will reinforce healthy choices. Participants also learn tips that promote healthier food choices, compatible with the lifestyle and cuisine of Latino families. The curriculum uses cultural traditions and values, such as: traditional foods, promenading in the plaza, Latino seasonings, and dancing.

III. Effects of Obesity on New York's Latino Community

These issues of public health are disproportionately impacting low-income communities and people of color. Recent rates of overweight and obesity show that Latinos have surpassed the general population by ten percentage points, with the highest prevalence of any ethnic group in the State of New York. Alarmingly, 28.3% of Latino males, 31.3% of Latino females and 31% of Latino children in New York City are obese. Non-coincidentally, the New York Times reports that "among people under the age of 40, Hispanics are four times more likely as whites or Asians to have [diabetes]," and rates of obesity have risen drastically over the past two decades. In the Central Bronx alone, 60% of adults are overweight or obese (NYC Dept. of Health and Mental Hygiene) and generally, Bronx residents are approximately 85% more likely to be obese than Manhattan residents (New York Times, March 14, 2010).

The overweight and obesity epidemic can largely be coupled with issues of socioeconomic inequality and food insecurity. One can not ignore the strong correlation between extraordinarily high rates of obesity in neighborhoods like the Central Bronx and their limited access to affordable, healthy food, while fast food is omnipresent. "Full-service, reasonably priced supermarkets are rare in impoverished neighborhoods, and the ones that are there tend to carry more processed foods than seasonal fruits and vegetables. A 2008 study by the city government showed that 9 of the Bronx's 12 community districts had too few supermarkets, forcing huge swaths of the borough to rely largely on unhealthful, but cheap, food (New York Times, March 12, 2010)." The citizens of these community districts, Black and Latino, are victims of food insecurity. Their struggle with overweight and obesity is not simply the result of irresponsible individuals making poor nutritional choices, but rather, hungry individuals fulfilling their biological needs by any means necessary. The Bloomberg administration has acknowledged the link between food insecurity and obesity and begun making plans to address it. The Deputy Mayor for Health and Human Services, Linda Gibbs, said, "We tackle the challenge on three fronts — providing income supports, increasing healthy options and encouraging nutritious behavior (New York Times, March 12, 2010)."

IV. Conclusion

CHCF commends this effort to address the issue of obesity, but also cautions the Department of Health and Mental Hygiene, as well as the Mayor's Office, regarding the potential for overregulation should such amendments become more common. We call upon the Mayor to support more community-based and culturally sensitive initiatives to encourage New Yorkers to make healthier choices, including tax incentives to encourage healthier food options in the forms of supermarkets and restaurants to set up shop in low-income neighborhoods.

Re: Opposition to Proposed Rule Related to Maximum Size of "Sugary Drinks" and Self-Service Beverage Cups

Dear Members of the Board of Health:

On behalf of the International Franchise Association (IFA), I urge you not to proceed with the above proposed rule. If enacted, it would negatively impact many of IFA's members and their employees and do nothing to reduce obesity.

As the largest and oldest franchising trade group, IFA's mission is to safeguard the business environment for franchising worldwide. The IFA represents more than 90 different industries, including more than 12,000 franchisees, 1,100 franchisors, and 600 supplier members nationwide, many of whom are restaurants. In New York State, franchise businesses support more than 784,000 jobs and $46 billion in economic output.

Limiting the sale of beverages to consumers will do nothing more than force small business franchise restaurant owners to raise prices on other items to account for the loss in sales, or worse yet, consider laying off workers, and neither option is a good option.

Additionally, restaurant owners will incur many operating costs in order to comply with the proposed rule's requirements. These include the purchase of additional equipment or remodeling expenses, which will be significant and borne by thousands of businesses.

IFA urges the New York City Board of Health not to adopt this draconian rule.

Sincerely,

Judith Thorman

Comment: As a recent graduated from UC Berkeley School of Public Health in Health and Social Behavior with a specialty in nutrition, I am fervently in support of Mayor Bloombergs innovative and important proposed serving size limit for sugary drinks. Sugary drinks are not the only cause of the obesity problem, but they are a BIG one. Sugary drinks provided huge amounts of empty calories that the American diet simply cant afford. This proposal is an excellent way of encouraging reduced consumption without stepping on anyones rights to decide what they put in their body.
I dont believe that this proposal will hurt business either because businesses already make a broader profit margin on smaller containers. Plus, if people come back for another 16 ounces then theyre making even more money.
I also believe there is a human right to clean, safe drinking water. As long as residents can get safe drinking water from their taps and free cups of water from most restaurants I dont see how this proposal hurts individuals, either.
the argument that this proposal is too paternalistic, I would point to many regulations in place to limit the consumption of alcohol - such as holding bar tenders responsible for the actions of their patrons who drink to excess.
In sum, I strongly urge the NYC Board of Health to vote in favor of this proposed limit - for the health of New Yorkers and for the ripple effect it will have on sugary drink policy work across the country.
Everyone is looking to NY to choose health!
Thank you.

Comment: Soda Ban. Nice democratic process theater. Is it on Broadway or still and off-Bway sorta thing? Youve made the decision-theres no democratic process in this. As a taxpayer and citizen, Im appalled. Stop telling everyone what to do. I dont even drink soda. I weigh 115 lbs and run 3+ miles a day. A healthy weight and working out is called choice-as a reminder-choice means that I, as an individual, choose things. Its not a difficult concept. But sometimes (Im sure the cops will be at my door any minute-thats ok I actually think NY Cops are awesome-happy to pay my taxes for them) I even eat red meat. The horror! And when Im really gonna go NUTS, I have dessert! And just last year, I ate at McDonalds TWO who times in ONE YEAR. Im so sorry Dear Leader-please forgive me-please spare my life. I promise I will try not to eat at McDonalds EVER again.

RE: Amendment to Article 81 / Proposal to Ban Sugar-Sweetened Beverages Larger Than 16 Oz. – OPPOSE

The Foodservice Packaging Institute (FPI), the trade association for manufacturers and suppliers of single-use foodservice packaging in North America, respectfully asks you to oppose the Department's proposal to amend Article 81 and ban sugar-sweetened beverages larger than 16 ounces in New York City for the following reasons:

- This proposal intervenes in the free market.
  - Foodservice establishments provide beverages based on their customers' wishes. "Big brother" should not intervene and dictate to foodservice establishments what they can and cannot serve. Consumers have the right to determine what, and how much, they want to drink. If this passes, what's next?

- The proposal will have little impact on reducing obesity because it incorrectly targets a small percentage of the marketplace.
  - According to data from the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services' 2011 National Center for Health Statistics Data Brief on Consumption of Sugar Drinks in the United States, 2005-2008, less than a quarter of all purchases of "sugary drinks" are made at foodservice establishments.

- The proposal will have little impact on reducing obesity because many consumers are already choosing smaller sizes.
  - According to data obtained by FPI, roughly two in every three cups sold for cold beverages are already 16 ounces and under.

- The proposal will inadvertently restrict the amount of non-sugary drinks, too.
  - Since foodservice establishments with self-serve fountain drinks would most likely only hand out cups of 16 ounces or less to comply, consumers who opt for "diet" drinks would also be impacted.

For these reasons, we must respectfully oppose the Department's proposal to amend Article 81 and kindly ask you to do the same on July 24.

Sincerely,

Lynn M. Dyer

The New York Academy of Medicine

At the heart of urban health since 1847

Testimony for the Meeting of the NYC Board of Health on the Proposal to Ban the Sale of Large Sugar Sweetened Beverages
Public Meeting – July 24, 2012

The New York Academy of Medicine (NYAM) has been advancing the health of people in cities since 1847. An independent organization, NYAM addresses the health challenges facing the world's urban populations through interdisciplinary approaches to research, education, community engagement, and policy leadership. Our current priorities include creating environments that support healthy aging; strengthening systems that prevent disease and promote the public's health; and working to eliminate health disparities.

We appreciate the opportunity to share our views on the proposed plan to limit sales of sugar-sweetened beverages to 16 oz serving sizes. Our archives indicate NYAM has had the opportunity to comment on the health and safety of beverages purveyed in New York dating back to our start in 1847, when water quality and the safety of milk sold in the City were at issue. The crisis before us today is an epidemic of preventable, diet-related diseases, which the City has been addressing through multiple strategies, including strong attention to the role of sugary beverages. We would like to share the following observations with the members of the Public Health Board about the portion cap proposal and the City's approach to obesity prevention.

First, we believe it is clear that the New York City food environment requires transformation. Diet-related chronic diseases are pervasive, with diabetes, heart disease, and obesity causing needless suffering at alarming rates across our neighborhoods, and particularly among lower-income populations and communities of color.[1] The unhealthy foods that contribute to these conditions—such as foods with excessive quantities of sodium, fat, and calories—are abundant and ubiquitous. Contrary to industry claims, consumers are in no imminent threat of diminished freedom of choice. The American Beverage Association, for example, boasts that consumers have more soft drink options available than ever before,[2] and the Coca-Cola Company alone has a selection of more than 3,500 beverages available for sale.[3] New Yorkers do not suffer from a lack of options.

Along with an overwhelming array of food choices, there is an overwhelming amount of information in the public sphere about what to eat, and what not to eat. 76% of consumers say they don't know what to believe when it comes to nutrition information.[4] In such a confusing environment, it seems particularly dangerous that low-income neighborhoods and communities of color that have high rates of disease are also burdened with disproportionate exposure to ads encouraging consumption of unhealthy foods.[5]

Our environment presents a toxic mix, particularly for low-income families pressured to get the most value for their dollar. With the portion cap proposal, Mayor Bloomberg clearly communicates a scientifically-based message: sugary beverages are harmful in large quantities. The purported economic value of "Super-value," large portion sizes has in fact a real cost to health. There is substantial evidence that larger portion sizes, particularly in liquid form, lead to increased daily caloric intake.[6] As Dr. Kelly Brownell has recently argued, it would be irresponsible for our leadership to continue to observe the toll sugary beverages take on the public's health and not take action. Government should intervene when there are products for sale (be they cars, or adjustable rate mortgages, or foods) that cause harm to the consumer.[7]

The cap appears to be a justifiable public policy intervention. But will the proposal impact our City's epidemic of chronic disease? While studies of the price elasticity of sugary beverages indicate that a properly-structured tax could curb the purchase and likely consumption of sugary beverages,[8] we know less about how the portion cap proposal will impact consumption and obesity. Very few studies have been done on the impact of this type of intervention.[9] Decision-makers concerned about the toll sugary beverages impose on New Yorkers should revisit the soda tax proposal.[10] In the interim, the portion cap seems like a reasonable approach with minimal likely negative impacts, though its effects should be measured.

NYAM also urges the Board to encourage the Department of Health to broaden the scope of its obesity-prevention work by developing stronger partnerships with community organizations, and in particular with food security advocates. These groups know well the dietary challenges faced by the 1.4 million food-insecure New Yorkers who confront the most barriers to making healthy choices. Poverty is a particularly important factor in obesity among very young children. These children are then set on a course that includes a lifetime of health-related challenges. New York's food stamp enrollment efforts and other food programs need additional attention and resources, and New York's obesity prevention strategy needs the direct input of this community.

In sum, NYAM both supports the Mayor's proposal and encourages further action. We ask you, our colleagues in public health, and the community at large to continue to advise the DOH and the Mayor in transforming New York's food environment toward one that is more supportive of healthy choices for all.

Dear New York City Board of Health,

i know you people are politicians. That means that things have to be kept at a reasonable simple level here so you can understand.

First, this is truly stupid and ineffectual from a biochemical and nutritive point of view. In other words: The Science is NOT backing up this stupid idea.

HFCS (High Fructose Corn Syrup) is presented as a semi-health alternative to sugars, but is NOT. If you consume 100 calories of sugar, about one or two of those calories will turn into fat on the average person's biochemistry. Now if you take 100 calories of HFCS, the avg person will turn about 40 of those calories into fats IN THE ORGANS and primarily in the abdomen. This causes organ damage, and in fact, one can develop Non-Alcoholic Fatty Liver Disease within 3 weeks of HFCS consumption. Think cirrhosis of the liver because it is the equivalent.

Your aspartames and other artificial "alternatives" are deadly. Hmmm, aspartame turns into formaldehyde, ethanol, and other toxic compounds IN YOUR BRAIN. Bad plan! Plus it is a neurotoxin and neuroexciter, which means it overstimulates your sensory cells. It can factually burn out some of your seratonin receptors and then how is one to deal with depression?

In Canada, breakfast cereals are now allowed to be sweetened with that Sweet and Low stuff. It is literally killing people by destroying their intestines to the point that they can literally (and very painfully i understand) not digest ANY FOOD. No nourishment and the body is toast, do you understand this?

Now let's talk freedom. No government body has the legal authority to force food or health choices on the citizenry of the United States of America. That is a right and freedom retained by we the people. We have over 230 years of legal precedent, and in fact, western (& other) civilization would not have survived without this freedom, and the ability to grow, preserve, and consume whatever foods they could. You wouldn't be here without that freedom.

Your information is slanted by corporations who simply want to catch the increased sales of their chemicals, and chemicals are not going to be healthy for a human body. Period. You look and you will find that NO pharmaceutical drug corrects the cause of any illness - it simply masks the symptoms. Artificial vitamins are at BEST 70% as effective as the natural compound but can be as ineffective as to have zero vitamin activity except for blocking the receptors your real vitamins need to repair the damage caused by the fake chemical you took. If you want proof look at that horrible study in the JAMA recently in which they actually stated that vitamin E consumption would be bad for prostate cancer and i heard of another that supposedly came to the same conclusion for breast cancers. Well, that was dl-alpha tocopherol, the patented, crappy pharmaceutical "vitamin E" that has been known to be a waste since the 1990s!

If you did a little research, you WOULD find that breast cancer tumors have parabens in them from your deodorants and maybe some other hygiene products like shampoos. 99% of all breast cancer tumors have parabens in them, and these parabens are hormone mimics, so you tell me, which is more dangerous, a real vitamin (vitamins are actually defined as substances without which you WILL inevitably die) or your toxic BO juice?

No, the point here is that you are being sold a bill of goods that is no good, unsupported by the science, and anti-American to boot. If you elect to support this trash proposal and infringement of rights you deserve to be pummeled into unconsciousness with an organic carrot.

Who are you to decide on what size drink I can order? Is this the Soviet Union? Are we now a Communist country?

The last time I checked this was the United States of America and we had the freedom of choice.

Besides do you actually think limiting drinks to 16oz will actually stop obesity? Come on!

Dear New York City Board of Health,

I am writing in opposition to Mayor Michael Bloomberg's proposal to limit the size of soda and similar sugar-sweetened beverages sold in restaurants, movie theaters and food carts to 16 ounces. I am appalled that the mayor feels it necessary to to strong arm and 'Nanny' people. Obesity and dietary education are a better way to change behavior. I urge you to vote against this proposal.

Promote healthy beverages (water), the only ones to profit from this proposal are the beverage sellers.

New York is one of the greatest cities in the world. Do not become the first on the slippery slope of telling people what and how much of a particular food they can eat and drink. But Mayor Michael Bloomberg proposal is not the answer, Please do not approve Mayor Bloomberg's proposal.

Sincerely,

Mayor Bloomberg's proposal to limit the size of sugary drinks in food establishments is an important step in the right direction. Given that obesity is a key risk factor for many debilitating diseases, like diabetes and hypertension, a move as simple as this could have a long-term positive effect on the health of countless children and adults in New York. We hear from many of our Federally Qualified Health Centers (FQHCs) that the numbers of overweight and obese patients they treat are on the rise. We feel that the amendment of Article 81 would only complement the important work of many health care providers in treating obesity. In recognition of the urgent need to address obesity in children and adults, especially those living in underserved communities, we stand poised to lead and assist our FQHCs in implementing strategies and adopting systems that will support the Mayor's message.

New York City's Limit on Size of Sugary Beverages: Proposed Amendment of Article 81

Mayor Bloomberg's Anti-Obesity Initiative

The Community Health Care Association of New York State (CHCANYS) has partnered successfully with the New York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene to address the epidemic rise in New York City's overweight and obese children through the NYC Childhood Obesity Initiative. However, there is still much more work to be done. Mayor Bloomberg's proposal to limit the size of sugary drinks in food establishments is an important step in the right direction.

Given that obesity is a key risk factor for many debilitating diseases, like diabetes and hypertension, a move as simple as this could have a long-term positive effect on the health of countless children and adults in New York State. We hear from many of our Federally Qualified Health Centers (FQHCs) that the numbers of overweight and obese patients they treat are on the rise. In fact, our Quality Improvement (QI) program is launching pediatric obesity initiatives in Oswego, Onondaga, Cayuga, Orange, Putnam, Rockland and Westchester counties. These initiatives aim to help prevent, identify, and treat childhood obesity at some of the FQHCs in those counties through the provision of targeted training for health care providers and the creation of new partnerships with other community-based organizations.

We feel that the amendment of Article 81 would only complement the important work of many health care providers in treating obesity. On behalf of CHCANYS, we admire and support the Mayor's innovative efforts to put New York State on the map as a national leader in addressing this public health crisis. In recognition of the urgent need to address obesity in children and adults, especially those living in underserved communities, we stand poised to lead and assist our FQHCs in implementing strategies and adopting systems that will support the Mayor's message.

Elizabeth Swain
President and CEO

The Community Health Care Association of New York State represents more than 60 community, migrant and homeless health centers that provide primary, preventive and dental care, as well as mental health, substance abuse and other community-based services to anyone in need regardless of their insurance status or ability to pay. In New York State, community health centers provide high quality health care to more than 1.4 million residents at over 500 sites across the state.

RE: The proposed amendment to Article 81 - Food Preparation and Food Service Establishments (the "sugary drink portion size" proposal)

I am writing to express my strong support for this amendment. The reasons for it are compelling:

- Obesity is a major health problem among New Yorkers; it raises risks for chronic diseases that are expensive to individuals, families, and society.
- Obesity is the result of excessive calorie intake relative to expenditure.
- Sugary drinks are a major source of calories in American diets.
- Sugary drinks contain calories but no nutrients; they are candy in liquid form.
- Sugary drinks are not required in the diet; they are entirely discretionary.
- Research finds strong correlations between habitual consumption of sugary drinks, excessive calorie intake, and weight gain.
- A 16-ounce soft drink contains two standard servings of 8 ounces each.
- The sugars in a 16-ounce soft drink provide 10% of the energy required by a person consuming 2000 calories a day.
- Federal dietary recommendations suggest consuming no more than 10% of energy from added sugars.
- Researchers concerned about the effects of fructose sugars on metabolism advise consuming no more than 50 grams of added sugars (25 grams of fructose) per day, the amount in one 16-ounce sugary drink.

The argument that people should be free to choose soft drink sizes is specious. Research clearly shows that larger portions:

- Provide more calories than smaller portions.
- Induce individuals—even those who are educated--to consume more calories than they would from smaller portions.
- Induce individuals to underestimate the calories they are consuming by a larger percentage than they would from smaller portions.

blog: www.foodpolitics.com twitter: @marionnestle

Research also indicates that people tend to consume what is in front of them and to eat less when given smaller portions.

Taken together, the existing evidence strongly suggests that individuals can best control their calorie intake by consuming smaller portions.

The proposal to restrict the size of sugary soft drinks to 16 ounces or less is a reasonable intervention to help people consume fewer calories. It deserves full support.

Comment: This seems like a pointless Rule that is designed merely to get publicity. It can be bypassed. Free refills can be offered; buy one get 1 for 1 cent can be offered. 7-11, home of the drink the size of your head, is exempt? This makes it obvious how ridiculous this is. Further, large drinks are not the only thing making people fat. Banning them is not going to make NYC thin. Large food portions and processed, deep fried, manufactured foods are more of the issue. Are you going to regulate those next? Are you going to become the mommies daddies of NYC telling them what food the poor, stupid children can and cannot eat? Portions can be no more than 4 oz of meat; nothing fried; veggies are required; no dessert! Is that really your job? To set the menus of NYC restaurants? You have nothing better to have police inspectors do? Its absurd.

Comment:	Its not news that sugar isnt good for us. And its not news that our Mayor wants to legislate what we can and cannot eat, drink or smoke. My question is why in the world do we have pedestrian malls with seats in the middle of heavily trafficed areas where the fumes from cars and trucks are much worse that anything the council is trying to legislate. Pay for my health care and then, maybe, Ill care about these rediculous pieces of legislation.

Comment: Out of everything that should be banded especially in NYC even in the U.S.A., you waist tax payers time money on the size of a soda drink. People have choices (good or bad) and if they choice badly that is their choice. Dont blame others on your intake of sugar. Bad choices lead to bad health results that you can controll if you want to, (key words If YOU want to). I say this becasue I am an over weight woman who has made the wrong choices and who has decided to make the right choices by saying that I do not want a drink of soda, I would like a glass of water, Please! In reality, EVERYTHING is bad for you....even NYC and no one has band that.....YET?

Comment:	I feel very strongly in opposition to the ban on sugary drinks. This is one time that I feel the Mayor has just gone too far. There are far more pressing matters that demand his attention-not who is drinking soda. People know its not good for you, but then again it is their choice. If that is what they choose to drink that should be the end of it. There is no ban on the sale of cigarettes or alcohol and those are far more damaging than sugary drinks.

New York City's Limit on Size of Sugary Beverages: Proposed Amendment of Article 81

Mayor Bloomberg's Anti-Obesity Initiative

The Community Health Care Association of New York State (CHCANYS) has partnered successfully with the New York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene to address the epidemic rise in New York City's overweight and obese children through the NYC Childhood Obesity Initiative. However, there is still much more work to be done. Mayor Bloomberg's proposal to limit the size of sugary drinks in food establishments is an important step in the right direction.

Given that obesity is a key risk factor for many debilitating diseases, like diabetes and hypertension, a move as simple as this could have a long-term positive effect on the health of countless children and adults in New York State. We hear from many of our Federally Qualified Health Centers (FQHCs) that the numbers of overweight and obese patients they treat are on the rise. In fact, our Quality Improvement (QI) program is launching pediatric obesity initiatives in Oswego, Onondaga, Cayuga, Orange, Putnam, Rockland and Westchester counties. These initiatives aim to help prevent, identify, and treat childhood obesity at some of the FQHCs in those counties through the provision of targeted training for health care providers and the creation of new partnerships with other community-based organizations.

We feel that the amendment of Article 81 would only complement the important work of many health care providers in treating obesity. On behalf of CHCANYS, we admire and support the Mayor's innovative efforts to put New York State on the map as a national leader in addressing this public health crisis. In recognition of the urgent need to address obesity in children and adults, especially those living in underserved communities, we stand poised to lead and assist our FQHCs in implementing strategies and adopting systems that will support the Mayor's message.

Elizabeth Swain
President and CEO

The Community Health Care Association of New York State represents more than 60 community, migrant and homeless health centers that provide primary, preventive and dental care, as well as mental health, substance abuse and other community-based services to anyone in need regardless of their insurance status or ability to pay. In New York State, community health centers provide high quality health care to more than 1.4 million residents at over 500 sites across the state.

Comment:	The governments responsibility is to protect the citizens from all enemies foreign and domestic not from ourselves and our Moms. They have no business telling us what to eat and drink and how much to consume. Dont they have budgets to balance and jobs to create? Ive been hearing that rhetoric for most of my 53 years and seen little, if any, positive results. The government is getting too involved in things that are none of their business while ignoring the issues that they should spend more time on. People should read or re-read George Orwells, 1984 so they are reminded of where this is all leading!

Comment:	The city needs to worry about boosting the economy and not intruding on the lives of its citizens. We still live in a democratic state not a communist one. To ban certain sizes of soft drinks in establishments is ridiculous. People will continue to drink all the soda they want. Also there is no restriction on diet soda which is more harmful to you. Please tell this mayor to mind his business and worry about important not soda and not our second amendment rights!!!!

New York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene
New York City

Dear Sir/Madam

Re: Proposed Rule Article 81 - Food Preparation and Food Service Establishments

I am writing this letter of support for the New York City's pro-active regulatory and health promotion agenda (including Article 81) to reduce the escalating obesity and diabetes problem in its jurisdiction. I am writing this as the Director of the WHO Collaborating Centre for Obesity Prevention but I am also the co-chair of the International Obesity Taskforce.

Mayor Michael Bloomberg and the NYC Department of Health and Mental Hygiene are to be congratulated on the enormous strides they have taken in the development of public policy and programs to improve the food environments and healthy eating patterns. NYC is clearly the global leader in this regard. While politicians the world over show concern about the growing burden of obesity and its consequences, none has been prepared to take the level of policy action that Mayor Bloomberg has, thus giving NYC the best chance of reversing the obesity epidemic.

The NYC approach has been comprehensive and has included several regulatory strategies against which the food industry has mounted an enormous counter offensive – companies who profess to want to be part of the solution, lobbying very hard against good public policy. As part of this offensive, NYC has been called a 'Nanny State' – using precisely the same approach and words that the tobacco companies recently took in Australia as they lobbied against plain packaging of cigarettes. The reality is that when it comes to childhood obesity, the state's role as a steward is much closer to that of a nanny (protecting children and supporting parents) than it is to that of a corporation (exploiting children and undermining parents).

A very important point needs to be made in relation to regulatory strategies for obesity prevention. Many public health regulations which aim to reduce other major health problems, such as smoking, drinking, road injuries, occupational injuries and so on, actually directly regulate the behaviours of individuals in particular circumstances. For obesity prevention, no regulations can target individual behaviours, they all target the environment. So compared to what is already accepted public health practice, obesity prevention regulations have no impact on reducing individual liberties or food choices. Article 81 is targeting the food environment, not eating behaviours. However, because food choices are strongly influenced by the environment, a health promotion gain (overall reduction in the average sugary drink consumption) can be achieved without impinging on any personal choice liberties.

Article 81 has the strong backing of public health bodies, including the International Obesity Taskforce, and I would like to register that support through this consultation process.

Yours sincerely,

Boyd Swinburn, MB ChB, MD, FRACP
Alfred Deakin Professor
Director, WHO Collaborating Centre for Obesity Prevention

And

Co-chair, International Obesity Taskforce

Rule: Article 81 - Food Preparation and Food Service Establishments

Opinion on Proposed Rule: Against

Comment: The evidence that this ban will have any positive impact on obesity rates in the city of NY are questionable. Drinks far in excess of 16 oz have been the norm for many years (previous to the recent spike in obesity rates), and the recent proliferation of sugar free and diet drinks has taken a significant share of the beverage market without an impact on obesity rates (which continue to rise). This demonstrates that the supposed connection is a personal bias, not a scientific fact, making this an arbitrary law more suitable for a tyrant than a democratically elected representative of the people.

Opinion on Proposed Rule: For

Comment: New York Citys proposed limit on the size of sugary beverage is like a speed limit. As with excess speed, excess sugar can be deadly. Scientific studies that are independent of the beverage industry show clear connections between dramatic increases in sugary beverage container sizes, consumption levels and increases in obesity. Medical studies show clear connections between obesity and morbidity due to serious illnesses such as diabetes, heart disease, and even cancer. A government that signals to its residents that they need to slow down -- whether their vehicle speed or their sugar consumption -- is fulfilling an important obligation to the public. This portion control proposal alone may not end the obesity epidemic and rein in all of our health care costs, but it is an important step along a journey we must begin to save ourselves, both in terms of physical and financial health. Therefore, the New York State Association of County Health !
Officials (NYSACHO), whose mission is to support and empower local health departments in their work to promote health and wellness and prevent disease, disability and injury throughout New York State, supports this measure.

Opinion on Proposed Rule: Against

Comment: The proposed rule to establish a maximum size of 16 ounces of sugary drinks will prove to be extremely difficult for food service establishments to comply. Many manufacturer-sealed drinks come in 20 fluid ounces or greater. In addition, to get around this rule, a customer can purchase two or more of the 16 fluid ounce drink whereby defeating the purpose of this regulation - to decrease the prevalence of diabetes and obesity.

Comment:	Government should worry about building the economy of our city and NOT worry about what the size of the beverage is for its citizens. The mayor claims that he is concerned about obesity--yet diet soda isnt included in the ban which is more unhealthy than regular soda. This just proves that he wants to be a dictator and does not care about anyone. Lets worry about important issues and stop destroying businesses. Also, stop infringing on my second amendment rights.

Comments on the Proposal to Limit Portion Sizes in New York City

David Frisvold
Emory University

The proposal to place a cap on the size of sugary drinks sold in restaurants, food carts, and movie theaters will likely not have a large impact on obesity, but could be one component of a successful strategy to reduce obesity and improve health. Previous research that I have completed with Jason Fletcher of Yale University and Nathan Tefft of the University of Washington demonstrates that soft drink taxes are not effective in reducing childhood obesity because adolescents consume other high calorie beverages such as whole milk instead of soft drinks[1] and that restrictions on vending machines in schools are not effective in reducing total soft drink consumption because students drink soft drinks at home instead of at school.[2] I think this policy would likely be more effective than soft drink taxes or bans on vending machines in schools.

A reduction in portion sizes would reduce consumption and caloric intake from each portion purchased since the sizes would have fallen from, say, 32 ounces or 24 ounces to 16 ounces. The important question, then, is: will individuals consume a second portion or will they change what they drink. If individuals consume a second portion, then overall consumption and caloric intake could actually rise (if an individual would have consumed a 24 ounce drink, but now consumes two 16 ounce drinks). There will certainly be some doubling of portions consumed or substitution to other beverages that will occur, but I expect that there will be less of this than what our research demonstrates with soft drink taxes and vending machines restrictions. I expect that most of the substitution occurs across portion sizes (for example, one portion of soda after school substitutes for one portion in school when there are bans against soda in schools), instead of across ounces. Many individuals tend to drink the amount of liquid in the container, and there are costs associated with a second portion, which can be non-monetary costs such as carrying a second container or going back to the register and waiting in line for another drink. Thus, I expect that the restrictions on portion size will, overall, lead to a small decrease in ounces of soft drink consumption and caloric intake.

Testimony of Audrey Silk, Founder

NYC Dept. of Health and Mental Hygiene
Article 81
Food Preparation and Food Service Establishments [Soda Ban]

I speak not to the members on the board of the NYC Department of Health and Mental Hygiene that will be making the final decision on whether or not to ban "sugary drinks" larger than 16 fluid ounces because that decision to do so has already been made prior to this hearing. So I speak to members of the public, both now and in the future, who will one day read the official record and will know that objections were lodged against this proposal for the record.

Though I am the founder of a smokers' rights group based in NYC we have always argued that our position is less about smoking and more about the loss of civil liberties, the encroachment of the nanny state, infringement on private property rights, and all things of that nature including, now, this proposal to ban sales of soda over a certain size.

Over the course of 12 years, since the unfortunate election of a man named Michael Bloomberg as Dear Leader of this city, I have learned that any hearing held on matters of alleged "public health" that seek to infringe upon the free choice of individuals to enjoy otherwise legal products by eliminating choice through force of law are for show. The matter was decided the minute the idea entered his head and the heads of his health police (aka DOH, aka hearing board members).

I will no longer be a party to the charade for use as a show piece and refuse to attend this July 24th "hearing" in person. I submit written comment instead for the sake of the record alone.

At the last hearing where I and members of my organization did personally attend and speak in front of members of two city council committees in regard to the proposal to ban smoking in parks, pedestrian plazas, and on beaches, I ended my testimony by saying:

> "Approve this and soon I'll be here again testifying against your plan to ban smoking in homes. Well I don't think so. This is where we draw the line. It's time to flip the script."

Approve it they did.

And what do you think happened next? Bloomberg proposed a multi-unit dwelling smoking policy bill (tenants are to be informed about the building's smoking policy) that no doubt will be followed by a full legislated ban.

Testify? I don't think so. It's time to ignore them (and mock their cartoonish characters and circus antics). If we keep letting them believe that their field and their rules are the only ones to play on and by, by dancing at the end of their strings, these proposals will never end.

I am also a blogger for the Huffington Post, the internationally acclaimed news website founded by Arianna Huffington. I continue my written testimony for the record with my column published five days ago, on July 19th:

The (Soda) Counter Hearing to NYC's Phony Soda Ban Hearing

http://www.huffingtonpost.com/audrey-silk/the-soda-counter-hearing-_b_1685416.html

On Tuesday, July 24th, the complicit New York City Department of Health (DOH) will hold a hearing on Mayor Bloomberg's proposal to ban the serving of soda in cups and containers that are larger than 16 fluid ounces.

The sparkle of a "hearing" is as flat as an hours old open can of seltzer.

Despite the still open question over which body has the authority to enact such a ban -- the DOH or the city council -- the people would certainly protest if no hearing were held, as is our guaranteed democratic process. So they've got the process covered by going through the motions, but that's as far as any semblance of "fair" -- the partner to "democratic" -- goes.

When it's been pre-decreed by Bloomberg and Health Commissioner Thomas Farley and the hearing board members are all, well, on board, let alone full of Bloomberg appointees, then what we have is a theatrical production, not a hearing. No better than an oppressive regime attempting to convince the world that it takes good care of its people by dressing up a few in new clothes and parading them in front of cameras.

Anyone who's ever participated in public hearings (whether held by the council or a city agency) on ideas essentially declared beforehand as a fait accompli can tell you what transpires.

The officiating panel barely listens as you speak, walks in and out at will, and never lets you ask them questions (and here I thought it's they who answer to the people, not the other way around). In fact, there are instances where the members of the public who present testimony are treated as if they are on trial -- interrogated by public servants acting like judges instead if your comments are the truth but fail the political correctness test or dare to question the panel's decided "wisdom."

Prime examples are the two smoking (first bars, then parks/beaches) and trans fat ban hearings since the kingdom of Bloombergastan was installed. Bloomberg spoke and is notorious for saying the people can speak too. What beneficence! Except listening isn't part of the bargain as far as he or other city officials are concerned.

Preceding a scheduled hearing about Walmart's intent to open stores in the city, City Council Speaker Christine Quinn had said, "We are very clear that Walmart as it presently does business...is not a company that is good for New York City," and then condemned Walmart execs for declining to testify, sickeningly feigning some sort of ability to be impartial with the follow-up, "If they don't show up it's because they don't have anything to say to refute the arguments that my colleagues and myself have put forth. If they did...why wouldn't they come and rub my face in it?"

Oh please. Spare me. She made it quite clear that only she -- who makes the final decision -- has it right and would run the hearing like judge, jury and executioner.

And so it will go too with the officials hearing testimony about their soda ban.

You'd been warned that infringements on otherwise legal lifestyle choice wouldn't stop at smoking. Anyone compelled to blurt out "smoking is different" is to be willfully stubborn when the head nanny himself is saying it's the same. He's compared "sugary drinks" to "asbestos and cigarettes" and with his war on smoking -- describing both as "bad habits that exploit the poor and less-educated."

It's not about smoking, soda, trans fat, sugar, salt and whatever else they will think of next (tackle the alleged "number one preventable cause of death" and the next on the list becomes "number one" and "something must be done"). It's about control. And no lie is too great to achieve it.

To bolster their argument that large portion sizes of soda increases obesity, the DOH writes in the proposal notice that "Portion sizes are increasing -- and bigger portions lead to greater consumption of sugary drinks," and cite a study (conducted by like-minded activist researchers) for that claim. But if anyone looked (pssst... they count on you not peeking), not only is there no such sentence in that form but the main culprit in that study are cookies! Better start stockpiling your Oreos now folks.

No matter that many can recall the countless times they've witnessed the woman (and sometimes man), apparently concerned with watching her weight, order a full meal at the next table in the restaurant and then order a diet drink, the problem must be, according to Bloomberg et al, soda.

Regardless of how one might feel about Walmart they did it right when it came to that hearing. They refused to attend.

I call for an encore.

I invite Coke, Pepsi, the entire beverage industry, the group New Yorkers for Beverage Choices, every other party affected by this proposal, and all private citizens that get that this isn't just about soda or smoking or trans fat but the death stomp on our freedom to make our own choices by this megalomaniac and his servants, to put their foot down and declare, "I will not attend."

Then we hold our own hearing the same day right outside their doors and invite them to testify and answer our questions. And if they won't? Well, we simply pile on anyway, as happened at that Walmart hearing in their absence.

In fact every beverage buying individual is invited! Want that seltzer? Do you know this affects you too? It's not just the serving by food service establishments of soda in cups larger than 16 ounces that will be banned. This is a ban -- get this -- on cups! Any self-service establishment that is under the watch of the health department can no longer provide any container over that size! To quote our keepers: "Without such limitation, a self-service cup exceeding the maximum size could be used for either non-sugary or sugary drinks." No cheating children!

So let's think about doing this. We can call it: Notice of Public's Hearing -- Opportunity for Policy Makers to Explain Themselves.

In the meantime, by all means, accept the invitation by the Ministry of... er... Dept. of Health to submit a written comment on the proposed rule for the record.

A simple, "I object but refuse to participate any further in this sham of a hearing," will do.

At least when historians look back at what went wrong during this period in time they'll find the evidence that many couldn't stomach the arrogance of Mayor -- You'll Thank Me Later -- Bloomberg (or the soggy fries -- not a crispy one in the bunch -- one's forced to endure since he banned trans fat).

Thirty-two ounces of seltzer couldn't settle such stomachs.

DonApprove the Mayor's Sensible Beverage Proposal

Dear New York City Board of Health,

i know you people are politicians. That means that things have to be kept at a reasonable simple level here so you can understand.

First, this is truly stupid and ineffectual from a biochemical and nutritive point of view. In other words: The Science is NOT backing up this stupid idea.

HFCS (High Fructose Corn Syrup) is presented as a semi-health alternative to sugars, but is NOT. If you consume 100 calories of sugar, about one or two of those calories will turn into fat on the average person's biochemistry. Now if you take 100 calories of HFCS, the avg person will turn about 40 of those calories into fats IN THE ORGANS and primarily in the abdomen. This causes organ damage, and in fact, one can develop Non-Alcoholic Fatty Liver Disease within 3 weeks of HFCS consumption. Think cirrhosis of the liver because it is the equivalent.

Your aspartames and other artificial "alternatives" are deadly. Hmmm, aspartame turns into formaldehyde, ethanol, and other toxic compounds IN YOUR BRAIN. Bad plan! Plus it is a neurotoxin and neuroexciter, which means it overstimulates your sensory cells. It can factually burn out some of your seratonin receptors and then how is one to deal with depression?

In Canada, breakfast cereals are now allowed to be sweetened with that Sweet and Low stuff. It is literally killing people by destroying their intestines to the point that they can literally (and very painfully i understand) not digest ANY FOOD. No nourishment and the body is toast, do you understand this?

Now let's talk freedom. No government body has the legal authority to force food or health choices on the citizenry of the United States of America. That is a right and freedom retained by we the people. We have over 230 years of legal precedent, and in fact, western (& other) civilization would not have survived without this freedom, and the ability to grow, preserve, and consume whatever foods they could. You wouldn't be here without that freedom.

Your information is slanted by corporations who simply want to catch the increased sales of their chemicals, and chemicals are not going to be healthy for a human body. Period. You look and you will find that NO pharmaceutical drug corrects the cause of any illness - it simply masks the symptoms. Artificial vitamins are at BEST 70% as effective as the natural compound but can be as ineffective as to have zero vitamin activity except for blocking the receptors your real vitamins need to repair the damage caused by the fake chemical you took. If you want proof look at that horrible study in the JAMA recently in which they actually stated that vitamin E consumption would be bad for prostate cancer and i heard of another that supposedly came to the same conclusion for breast cancers. Well, that was dl-alpha tocopherol, the patented, crappy pharmaceutical "vitamin E" that has been known to be a waste since the 1990s!

If you did a little research, you WOULD find that breast cancer tumors have parabens in them from your deodorants and maybe some other hygiene products like shampoos. 99% of all breast cancer tumors have parabens in them, and these parabens are hormone mimics, so you tell me, which is more dangerous, a real vitamin (vitamins are actually defined as substances without which you WILL inevitably die) or your toxic BO juice?

No, the point here is that you are being sold a bill of goods that is no good, unsupported by the science, and anti-American to boot. If you elect to support this trash proposal and infringement of rights you deserve to be pummeled into unconsciousness with an organic carrot.

Don't Legislate My Choices

I agree with the Mayor and the department of Health that obesity is a serious issue. It is definitely a epidemic that is seriously impacting our Health Care System.

What I do not agree with, is how to tackle this. Legislating the size of the drink I can buy is not the way to do this. This legislation will only hurt entrepreneurs and businesses in NYC and it will not help reduce obesity. This is also going to affect profits, which is going to cost jobs. In such a fragile economy I wonder if this is really something we should be doing. If you restrict the use of something people will find a way around the rules to get what they want. Restricting access will make it just that much more exciting and desirable to young people.

We should be going after this by educating kids and families. We need to change peoples' habits and behaviors not legal tell them what they can and cannot have. Education should be the key. If we educated people on this and taught them more about nutrition than The Food Plate we would have a much better chance of tackling obesity.

Every law like this just chips away at the basic freedoms of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. If a 51 oz Coke is going to make someone happy and Coke is legal then they should be able to have that Coke.

More than anything I do not like the precedent that this sets. This opens the door for the government to tell me how much salt I can put on my food, how rare I can eat my steak and how much salad dressing I can put on salad. I have spent the last few years changing my diet. I now eat far more fresh fruits and vegetables than I ever did before. The reason I did this is I read a lot about it and I had people educate me on the importance of it. I did not have any one take options away from me. The only way to make a serious change like this is through education. We could do this with the rest of the city and America if we just spent the money on Education. I feel like this is the Mayor telling everyone that they are too stupid to make their own decisions, so he is going to make the decisions for us.

Don't legislate my choices!!!!

Dear Dr. Farley,

I'm writing to you because I believe it should be up to me-not the government-to make nutritional choices for my family.

A limit on beverage sizes will not limit consumption; it will only limit personal choice.
Please say "No" to Mayor Bloomberg's ban on beverages over 16 ounces.

Sincerely,

Statement by Dr. Harold Goldstein, Executive Director of the California Center for Public Health Advocacy, on Mayor Bloomberg's Proposal to Limit the Sizes of Sugary Drinks

The California Center for Public Health Advocacy urges everyone to kick the (soda) can, so we applaud Mayor Bloomberg's dogged commitment to helping New Yorkers do just that. The introduction of his proposal to shrink the size of sugary drinks sold in the city has raised awareness around the country that these drinks aren't benign additions to our diets. We hope the Board of Health takes the next step and implements the policy. The status quo encourages mindless guzzling of excessive calories. This would be a step toward conscious consumption, which given the $147 billion spent annually on obesity-related medical costs, doesn't seem too much to ask. We're cheering you on in California, Mayor Bloomberg.

This proposal is ridiculous.

Dear New York City Board of Health,

Limiting the size of sugared soda drinks seems, on the surface, like a very sensible and reasonable rule (not one that I think the government has any business making, but that is not the point I want to make here). In practice, though, it doesn't solve the real problem and it creates a long list of new ones.

In order to enforce this law, first you'll need to eliminate every large drink glass and cup from the city to replace them with smaller ones, at a cost of hundreds of thousands of dollars to shopkeepers and restaurateurs. Then, you'll need to ensure that no restaurant provides free refills (and if you're really serious, limit the number of drinks that can be sold to a customer to one, which is preposterous).

If you want to enforce the spirit of this law, you'll have to stop selling 12 and 24 packs of soda at the store, and somehow persuade people never to drink more than one can or bottle of soda at a time. The income from these products is the lifeblood of movie theaters and a significant income source for restaurants that sell a glass of soda for $2.50 or more when their cost is well under ten cents. The economic incentive to work around your law is staggering, and the individual incentive to obey it is minute.

I absolutely agree that we must take significant steps to combat obesity. But this solution is not going to work. Please don't get me wrong -- I am strongly in favor of brainstorming new ideas to address the problem, and I hope you'll keep trying to think of better solutions. The soda size limit, though, is not the right answer.

Please accept this statement as written and oral testimony for the public hearing on the proposed ban on sugar-sweetened drinks larger than 16 oz, scheduled for 7/24.

Education & Exercise, Not Bans, Improve Obesity

My name is Jessica Levinson and I am a registered dietitian and founder of Nutritioulicious, a nutrition counseling and consulting practice here in New York City. Through my practice, I work with many New Yorkers, including adults and children, on dietary issues, such as being overweight or obese. I also consult with food and beverage companies about nutrition issues related to their products. I look forward to talking to you today about what is – and is NOT – needed to improve New Yorkers' health.

There's no doubt many people in our city struggle with their weight – and my career is dedicated to helping such individuals. But from my past six years of experience working with patients, I firmly believe that the proposal to restrict the sale of sugary drinks greater than 16 ounces is not the answer to the city's weight problems.

Implementing such a ban on sugar-sweetened drinks perpetuates the misguided idea that there are "good" and "bad" foods. This places a moral value on foods, which is detrimental (especially for children) and can lead to other disordered eating. In my professional experience, telling someone they can't have something – or forcefully limiting what they can have – makes most people want it even more.

There is no research to indicate that this ban would do anything to reduce obesity rates in the city. In fact, research from economic and behavioral experts indicates that so long as other options are available, people are likely to substitute their calories with other options – either buying a sweet drink elsewhere – or choosing another caloric beverage, like a shake or caloric coffee drink. The notion that someone who's craving a large soda will now drink tap water instead, or buy less, does not reflect the way most people really behave – and this action by the City will not change that behavior.

Finally, bans don't teach people how to be healthy. Unfortunately, there is no "magic bullet"; obesity is a multi-factorial problem – genes, activity level, and total diet all play a role. Therefore real solutions must involve educating New Yorkers on managing calorie intakes, taking a total diet approach and being physically active.

I question why the city is focused on soda when it makes up a small portion of the diet and the daily decisions we make about food. I wish those governing New York City and the Department of Health would spend more time educating children in their formative years by providing nutrition education in schools and increased time and space for physical education.

I don't believe banning certain foods and beverages will influence people to make healthier choices or reduce rates of obesity. I encourage the city to embrace comprehensive approaches to help New Yorkers make meaningful changes to their health. For example, better education, moving more and eating a balanced diet, WILL make a lasting impact on our City and adequately address this problem, not arbitrary, approach like bans.

Thank you for having me here today.

Disclosure: In addition to counseling individual clients through Nutritioulicious, I also consult with food and beverage companies including, Frito-Lay, The Coca-Cola Company, Centrum, Avocados from Mexico, and the Corn Refiners Association.

Dear New York City Board of Health,

We have the right to bear arms no matter what kind they are and can buy bullets that can go thru two people. Instead of coming together and changing laws to rid of some of those guns and bullets you want to tell people how to live. Really people chose to drink these type of sodas what next limit the amount of times you can eat out. Stay out of peoples chocies and focus on more important issues. Do not blame obesity on sugary drinks it is the persons choce. The mayor needs to get his head out of the sand and focus on more important issues.

Science compels you to pass Mayor Bloomberg's law.

Dear New York City Board of Health,

As people have consumed more sugar (aka sucrose, a molecule of which is one glucose and one fructose bonded together) and more high fructose corn syrup (essentially synthetic sucrose, as it is digested virtually the same way) over the past 30 years, a drastic increase in the amount of fructose the typical person digests every day has created the obesity epidemic. It is not a calorie input- calorie output issue--some calories have drastically different effects on our body's metabolic response, and calories high in fructose have a particularly negative effect on our metabolic system in terms of encouraging new fat cell production. Extensive scientific research supports this, much of which is very well summarized in the following video: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=0z5X0i92OZQ

Mayor Bloomberg's proposed law is a very positive step in terms of public health. Perhaps a good follow up would be to mandate that nutrition labels list the grams of High-fructose corn syrup and/ or Sucrose present in a food product, as what percentage of a daily recommended healthy level that is.

I am writing in support of Mayor Michael Bloomberg's sensible proposal to limit the size of soda and similar sugar-sweetened beverages sold in restaurants, movie theaters and food carts to 16 ounces. I applaud the mayor for taking this strong step to tackle obesity rates in New York City, and I urge you to approve the proposal.

Norms for sugary drink sizes are alarmingly high, as 32 and 64 ounce sodas are commonplace across the city. Even the proposed limit of 16 ounces is still double a standard 8-ounce serving. Mayor Bloomberg's plan is backed by extensive scientific research that shows growing portion sizes for sugary drinks are among the driving forces of the ongoing obesity epidemic.

Right now, about one-third of children and two-thirds of adults are overweight or obese. Obesity is an epidemic, and it contributes to growing rates of type 2 diabetes, heart disease, hypertension and even some cancers. If we do not reverse childhood obesity in particular, this generation of kids could be the first in America's history to live sicker and die younger than their parents' generation.

Bold action from leaders like you is needed to reverse the obesity epidemic, and we can't wait!

New York is one of the greatest cities in the world, and you have the opportunity to make it even greater, by continuing to lead the nation in using policy to improve nutrition and prevent obesity. Please approve Mayor Bloomberg's proposal and serve up a healthy change for our great city.

Sincerely,

Garrett Simpson

Testimony of Nancy Huehnergarth to the New York City Board of Health on the Proposed Sugary Drink Portion Cap

July 24, 2012

I'm Nancy Huehnergarth, a consultant on nutrition and physical activity policy, and a public health advocate who fought for the passage of the sugary drink tax proposed by Governor Paterson in 2009 and 2010.

I'm going to testify today on two topics:

- Do consumers currently have real choice when it comes to sugary drink portion sizes?
- How grassroots is the so-called "grassroots" opposition to Mayor Bloomberg's proposed portion cap?

You don't have to be a public health expert to notice that norms for soft drink sizes are dangerously out-of-whack. Let me start by stating the obvious. Sugary drink serving sizes are determined by the beverage industry, restaurants and other venues, based on what brings in the most profit. However, what's good for their bottom line isn't good for the health and well-being of New Yorkers, nor is it good for the economic health of the city. Over $4 billion is spent yearly in NYC on obesity-related medical expenditures and taxpayers are on the hook for much of it through the public insurances, Medicaid and Medicare.

One of the more disingenuous claims made by the beverage industry about Mayor Bloomberg's proposed 16 oz. portion cap on sugary drinks is that if the measure is enacted, it would take away consumer freedom. Let's be honest. The beverage industry, restaurants and other outlets decide which portion sizes of sugary drinks they will offer, based on their needs, not mine or yours.

If I occasionally want to order 1 serving of a sugary drink (and please keep in mind that 8 fluid ounces is universally recognized as a single serving), I can't do that at any restaurant, theatre or other venue that I frequent in New York City. Why? Because the smallest size soft drink sold is normally 12 or 16 ounces. It's practically impossible to find an 8 oz. sugary drink for sale anywhere -- even on a children's menu! So much for choice.

So, instead of purchasing a single serving of soda, I must order and pay extra for what I really don't want or need. And, as a growing body of research has shown, I'll likely finish the too-large sugary drink I purchased and ingest extra calories because I'm human and I drink what I'm served. Now contrary to what the beverage industry would like you to believe, this doesn't indicate personal failing or lack of willpower. Researchers are beginning to learn that humans are wired biologically to consume what is put in front of us. If the City of New York wants to encourage the consumption of reasonably-sized portions, consumers need to be served reasonably-sized portions.

Thanks to industry's profit-driven setting of the norms, few people today even realize that 8 ounces is a single serving of a soft drink. To summarize, today's supersized sugary drinks are being offered by the beverage industry, restaurants, theatres and stadiums, not because of consumer freedom or because of what's best for the consumer, but because this is what is best for industry's bottom line.

Moving on to the topic of the new, high-profile, grassroots coalition named New Yorkers for Beverage Choices, that opposes the 16 ounce cap, I think the term grassroots is highly misleading.

It turns out that the coalition is entirely the creation of the American Beverage Association and its high-powered issue advocacy firm Goddard Gunster (formerly Goddard Claussen). It's a classic astroturf coalition.

While New Yorkers for Beverage Choices claims on its website that it's a "coalition of citizens, businesses, and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose, " the members listed, with few exception, are businesses that sell soda and other sugary drinks including movie theatres, delis, pizzerias, restaurants, beverage companies and fast food organizations.

And let me assure you that issue advocacy firm Goddard Gunster is hardly a group of concerned citizens in New York City. It is based in Washington, D.C. and has been behind many similar beverage industry campaigns across the U.S. designed to derail proposed sugary drink taxes.

Some of you may remember that in 2010, the beverage industry bankrolled and organized an astroturf coalition called, New Yorkers Against Unfair Taxes, which opposed Governor David Paterson's proposed penny per ounce soda tax. The beverage industry spent close to $13 million lobbying against the tax from January to June 2010, one of the highest one-year lobbying expenditures in the history of New York State.

Much of the strategic and organizational work for that campaign and coalition also came from Goddard Claussen, the firm hired by the American Beverage Association. Goddard Claussen is infamous for its "Harry and Louise" campaign that helped defeat President Clinton's health care plan.

Goddard Claussen was so proud of its work in killing the NYS soda tax, that it highlighted its New Yorkers Against Unfair Taxes coalition on its website with a full page write-up that boasted: "As part of a comprehensive outreach effort, we recruited over 10,000 citizens and 158 businesses to join New Yorkers Against Unfair Taxes." Shortly after this web page was discovered by the media, it was removed from the website.

With the beverage industry on overdrive to halt sugary drink taxes and now the Bloomberg portion cap proposal, it's not surprising that everywhere a soda tax or portion cap has been proposed, an opposition coalition and website has quickly appeared, apparently bankrolled and organized by industry:

Texas: No Texas Beverage Tax□

Philadelphia: Philly Jobs. Not Taxes□

Washington, D.C.: No DC Beverage Tax□

Washington State: Washingtonians Against the Beverage Tax□

Rhode Island: Rhode Islanders Against the Beverage Tax□

Hawaii: No Hawaii Beverage Tax□

Baltimore: Stop the Baltimore City Beverage Tax□

Chicago: Chicago Coalition Against Beverage Taxes□

Pittsburgh: No Pittsburgh Beverage Tax□

Vermont: Stop the Vermont Beverage Tax□

Kansas: Kansans Against Food and Beverage Taxes□

Oregon: Oregon Coalition Against Beverage Taxes□

California: Californians Against Food and Beverage Taxes

Richmond CA: Community Coalition Against Beverage Taxes

Illinois: Illinois Coalition Against Beverage Taxes

The deep-pocketed American Beverage Association, which is funded by Coca-Cola, PepsiCo, Dr. Pepper/Snapple and others, is attempting to frame the portion cap proposal as an assault on consumer freedom. But in reality, it's industry that has trampled on consumer freedom and health by supersizing soft drink portion sizes to steadily increase profits.

I strongly urge the Board of Health to approve Mayor Bloomberg's bold proposal for a 16 ounce cap on sugary drink portion sizes. Let's bring sugary drink portion sizes back to normal and set a healthy example for the rest of the nation.

Hi Jose, here is my comment:

As a network of community health centers, Urban Health Plan sees first hand the impact that excessive sugar consumption can have on people's health. Our nutritionists and health educators work diligently with patients to stem the rising rates of diabetes and obesity and to teach them to manage their medical conditions. As an organization, we removed all sugary drinks from all vending machines at our sites and only provide water. We also conduct waiting room presentations related to the overabundance of sugar in our drinks.

I support the Mayor's proposed cap on sugary drinks. While limited healthy food options are available in our communities, anything that makes people aware of the amount of sugar they are consuming and the long-term damage it can cause to their health is a good thing.

Hope this is what you were looking for,

I just want to say that I feel what you are doing is wrong. I will tell you I am an overweight person, but guess what drinking soda or even eating fast food did not make me that way. I actually have a health issues, and there are many more out there like me. Soda is a treat in my family and so is eating out. When we go to the theatre I will buy a large soda and large popcorn not for myself, but to share with my husband and three children. Living on one income due to children with special needs we have to make every penny stretch. Yes I do not live in New York, but I live in the United States of America and I truly feel what you want to do is dictatorship. Slowly but sure we will need to change our pledge and songs because it will all be a lie. You take this freedom away what next?

Thank you for your time,

Opinion on Proposed Rule: Against

Comment: Article 81 sets a very dangerous precedent about the cumbersome influence of government on basic rights and proves government is missing the big picture. Limiting the size of ounces per drink is absurd - folks will buy a second drink. Whats next - implementing a police-state nation to ensure you cant serve or purchase two sugary drinks totalling more than 17 ounces in a given time period? This is very BIG BROTHER and quite disturbing for consumers and business owners. Government should invest resources to promote exercise as a way of healthy living, fund PE athletics in schools and give incentives to business owners so they can champion exercise for employees in their work-place environments. This effort would be a far more effective contribution to societys health.

Do Not Approve the Mayor's Sensible Beverage Proposal

Bill Champitto [bill@billchampitto.com]

To: Resolution Comments

Dear New York City Board of Health,

I am writing in opposition of Mayor Michael Bloomberg's sensible proposal to limit the size of soda and similar sugar-sweetened beverages sold in restaurants, movie theaters and food carts to 16 ounces. There are many things wrong with our food industry including portion size, but regulating vendors as to the size of the portions they are allowed to sell is not the solution.

Alternative lower calorie choices are regularly available. Smaller servings means more packaging, higher consumer cost and more profit for companies that are selling this product. The government has a responsibility to address our obesity situation but this proposal does not seem to address any realistic and reasonable factors but instead imposes restrictions that will cost consumers, create more waste and infringe on freedom of choice.

Requiring vendors and suppliers to provide alternatives, improve labeling and content disclosure, and restricting non-compete and exclusivity tactics of the suppliers would do more to affect the change than this intrusive and counter-productive measure would.

New York is one of the greatest cities in the world, and you have the opportunity to make it even greater, by continuing to lead the nation in using policy to improve nutrition and prevent obesity. Please find an alternative to Mayor Bloomberg's proposal and serve up a healthy change for our great city.

Sincerely,

Bill Champitto

Hello,

Life is all about choices and this is one that should be left up to the people! A ban like this will only hurt the economics of many businesses and punish the people that purchase and consume Food and Beverage products responsibly. Those that over indulge will still find a way to satisfy their needs and this will not hinder their consumption in any way.

Thanks, Chris

Dear New York City Board of Health,

Please help the Mayor to show that he cares about New York's public by approving the 16oz soda public limit that affects everyone's health in such a negative way.

In public it's fair to have high standards in place because we are all imitating each other, and our children see and learn from all of us.

New York is a global city, and we have the opportunity to make it even better, by caring and by helping each other to improve nutrition and to bring back a balance in people's public health.

Thank you for your help,
Jeni

NEW YORK SURE IS PRETTY TO BAD THE POLITICIANS WANT TO TELL ME HOW TO LIVE

In the past ten years you have raped the city of freedoms, I can smoke at a bar, i cant go into a restaurant and enjoy delicious friends foods, i can't go anywhere without seeing how many calories are in my foods and now you want to take away more of my FREEDOMS by telling me what size soda i can drink. COMMON i am not over weight and the people that are overweight guess what this is not going to help them at all. they will just bring soda with them places that they purchase from the local corner market. This time you have went to far and i think that most of your people agree. Don't you have better things to worry about now after this last weekend Spend your time working on gun control not controlling how much soda i drink. There is no proven link that ANY of your health initiatives are helping anything.....

You are currently running ads in other states telling them now NEW York is welcoming new businesses. UNLESS THEY WANT TO MAKE A PROFIT SELLING SOMETHING YOU DON'T LIKE RIGHT !!!!

Statement of Support for Setting a Maximum Size for Sugary Drinks Sold by New York City Food Service Establishments

Submitted to the New York City Board of Health, July 24, 2012

I present this testimony on behalf of the Public Health Association of New York City (PHANYC), one of the oldest and largest affiliates of the American Public Health Association. Our members include public health professionals, health practitioners (such as physicians, nurses, physician assistants and pharmacists), nutritionists, health care advocates and faculty and students of schools of public health, medicine and pharmacy in New York City.

The obesity epidemic that plagues our country has not spared New York City. One in four (24%) of our public elementary school children are obese and nearly 40 percent of all our public school children are either overweight or obese. The health consequences are serious, including increased risk of diabetes, heart disease and cancer. In our city, obesity is responsible for as many as 5,800 deaths per year, and an estimated $4 billion in direct medical costs. Clearly, we need to try new approaches to promote healthy eating and discourage consumption of unhealthy foods, including sugary drinks that are a major contributor to obesity.

We believe in the public's right to choose the food and drinks they consume. However, we should make healthy choices easier for consumers. Therefore, the routine choice, whenever possible, should be a healthy one. For this reason, the Public Health Association of New York City supports the proposal by the New York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene to set a maximum size for sugary drinks sold by food service establishments.

For years, the Department of Health has been actively engaged in making healthy choices easier. The city took "trans fats" out of restaurant food, introduced calorie posting on menu boards at chain restaurants, created Green Carts and supported expansion of farmers markets. The Department of Health has paired these initiatives with public education campaigns on television, buses, and subways. These advertisements reveal how the obesity all around us is related to the growth in portion sizes over the years, and to the large amounts of sugar hidden in the drinks we consume every day. The proposal to set a maximum size for sugary drinks at food service establishments is a creative way to address the obesity challenge. It makes the healthier option of a smaller drink size the easiest choice, by making it the routine choice.

By proposing a maximum size for sugary drinks sold by restaurants, movie theaters, stadiums and food carts, the Department of Health has already promoted a public dialogue about what a standard drink size is and should be. Over several decades, the trend has been to make drink sizes larger and larger. A soda size of at least two-and-a-half cups (20 ounces) is now the standard drink that comes with combo meals at fast food chains, and with popcorn at movie theaters. These larger drink sizes are pushed on consumers, making us think they are a normal drink size. What we don't see are the dangerous amounts of sugar and calories that we are taking in through a straw. The proposed maximum drink size will empower consumers to have time to think about whether they want to go back for a refill. It will support us in making a personal decision: Do I really want to consume more of this sugary drink?

Most importantly, this policy can help us to make an important change for the future of our children. Setting a maximum drink size will make healthier choices easier for children. Our children can still ask for seconds, but it will be a conscious decision by children and their parents. Children sometimes make choices when their parents are not around, and base these choices on what they see others choose. By making the routine choice the healthier choice, we will be role models for our children. This policy will help families steer children towards healthier choices and healthier lives.

Consumers will still be able to buy larger size sodas at grocery stores and bodegas, because those stores are not covered by the Department of Health's authority to regulate food service establishments. But, setting a maximum portion size at food service establishments can help us to come to a new idea of the normal size for a sugary drink. We may begin to choose smaller sizes at grocery stores, or select a larger drink that comes without a heavy dose of sugar.

We think the size limit proposal will need to be paired with a public education campaign that builds on the Department of Health's current efforts. Thanks to the Department of Health, we are now more aware of how much sugar lurks in the drinks we consume. Future public education should focus on how the public can be empowered to make healthy choices. Consumers should be encouraged to demand that healthy choices become the standard at all stores and food establishments. Offering a giant sugary drink as the standard is no choice at all.

The Public Health Association of New York City sees this proposal as an important pilot that will influence other cities and counties across the country. For this reason, the Department of Health will need to carefully evaluate the effectiveness of the policy at regular intervals, report results to the public, and enhance the policy as needed. Partnership with community groups and academic institutions around the city in developing, implementing, analyzing, and disseminating the evaluation will help to build public support for the policy.

Re: Opportunity to Comment on Proposed Repeal and Recodification of Chapter 6 (Food Units) of Title 24 of the Rules of New York City

Date: July 19, 2012

Thank you for accepting these comments of Keep Food Legal, a grassroots nonprofit incorporated in Washington, DC, on behalf of our members and supporters. Keep Food Legal is the first and only nationwide, nonprofit membership organization devoted to food freedom—the right of every American to grow, raise, produce, buy, sell, share, cook, eat, and drink the foods and beverages of their own choosing. Keep Food Legal members and supporters hail from New York City and from cities and towns across the United States. Our members and supporters are key cogs in nearly every link in the food chain: farmers, ranchers, fishermen, hunters, manufacturers, grocers, restaurateurs, mobile food vendors, tavern owners, chefs, consumers, foodies, activists, academics, and authors.

I am the founder and executive director of Keep Food Legal. I am a lawyer, earned an advanced degree in agricultural and food law, and have written and spoken extensively on mobile food vending law and policy. I have served as a panelist and panel organizer at national mobile vending conferences held in San Francisco, Chicago, and elsewhere. I have researched and written about New York City regulations pertaining to mobile food vending, including a forthcoming law-journal article and a March 2011 article in Reason magazine (the latter of which I incorporate by reference). Beginning next month, I will teach an undergraduate course on social media and foodways that will focus in large part on mobile food vending.

The notice announcing the Proposed Repeal and Recodification of Chapter 6 (Food Units) of Title 24 of the Rules of New York City ("the proposed regulations") makes clear that the purpose of the proposed regulations is "to provide more clarity" to those mobile food vendors subject to the regulations. Such clarity is an admirable goal. However, it is the opinion of Keep Food Legal members and supporters that the proposed regulations would in many ways restrict the rights of mobile food vendors and their customers in New York City in several ways. First, the proposed regulations would make permit holders legally responsible for a food cart or truck whether or not they operate that mobile unit. New York City's longstanding policy of refusing to issue new permits to mobile vendors has artificially inflated the value of these permits and is directly responsible for creating a black market in permitting in the city. A policy that increases the risks for existing permit holders will only serve to drive up the black-market price—and harm mobile food vendors and their customers in New York City in the process. Instead of fostering an illicit market, New York City should loosen its pointless stranglehold on the issuance of new mobile food-vending permits. Second, the proposed regulations would further restrict food-vendor access to public spaces in which to vend by prohibiting the use of propane tanks above any subway grate. Keep Food Legal is aware of the tremendous difficulty mobile food vendors face in finding legal space to vend in New York City. On the other hand, we are unaware of any problems involving mobile food vendors and subway grates in New York City or elsewhere. Consequently, this new burden would appear to benefit no one while further restricting the space in which mobile-food vendors may sell to hungry New Yorkers. Third, the proposed regulations require numerous costly reconfigurations to mobile vending units that do not appear to be designed to improve food safety. The addition of additional sink requirements and new requirements for potable water and wastewater tanks will likely require at least some existing mobile food vendors—who are often just able to eke out a living as is—to make costly improvements to their units or to purchase a new cart or truck. Such onerous requirements will certainly put some mobile food vendors out of business at a time when New York City (and New Yorkers) can least afford such a calamity. No existing mobile vendor should be forced to comply with burdensome requirements that they reconfigure their unit.

In summary, New York City regulations pertaining to mobile vending are notoriously harsh. Rather than improve the climate for mobile food vending in New York City, adoption of the proposed regulations would make a difficult situation even worse. The proposed regulations muddy the waters more than they "provide more clarity." For these reasons, Keep Food Legal and our members and supporters OPPOSE the proposed regulations. We urge the New York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene to reject the proposed regulations and to return to the drawing board to craft new and better regulations that embrace mobile food vending and vendors. In the alternative, we urge the Department to delay voting on this measure until mobile food vendors in New York City have had the opportunity to submit their own amendments to the proposed regulations.

Thank you for reviewing and considering the comments of Keep Food Legal and our members and supporters. I would be happy to offer further insight on these comments at your request.

Leaders and Anti-Obesity Advocates Express Support for Mayor Bloomberg's New Anti-Obesity Initiative

Mayor Bloomberg announced a plan to ban the sale of large sugary drinks at restaurants, movie theaters, and food carts in an effort to tackle obesity rates in New York City. The Mayor's Task Force on Obesity states that "Americans consume 200-300 more calories daily than 30 years ago, with the largest single increase due to sugary drinks." Obesity has led to a big increase in the prevalence of Type II diabetes, heart disease, asthma, and other problems. The ban would apply to all sugary drinks larger than 16 fluid ounces. A public hearing will be held on Tuesday, July 24, 2012 from 1 PM to 3 PM at:

Comment:	STATEMENT OF RICHARD R. BUERY, JR., PRESIDENT AND CEO, THE CHILDREN'S AID SOCIETY

"Obesity and diabetes are among the most serious health crises facing our children today. We applaud Mayor Bloomberg, Deputy Mayor Linda Gibbs, Commissioner Thomas Farley, the Department of Health Mental Hygiene, and the Task Force on Obesity for putting forth a progressive agenda to address this endemic problem—from building urban farms on New York City Housing Authority land to expanding school wellness programs to creating safe spaces for play. We especially support the Mayor's proposal to eliminate oversized sugary drinks. It is innovative and bold - exactly what we need in the face of a crisis that threatens the very foundation of health and quality of life for children across the country.

"At Children's Aid, we take obesity prevention seriously and work hard to make healthy choices easy for children within our sites. In our early childhood and after-school programs, we educate children and families about healthy eating through cooking, nutrition and gardening programs. We serve healthy meals full of fruits and vegetables and make sure children have plenty of opportunity for play and exercise. Yet, when children step outside of our centers and schools, they are often surrounded by unhealthy foods and drinks and exposed to an onslaught of advertisements that encourage ever greater consumption of junk. Without taking aggressive measures against this obesogenic environment, we will never curb the obesity crisis. We're grateful to be working in partnership with a Mayor and City that are paving the way for national solutions."

Dear New York City Board of Health,

This is the United States of America where we have soldiers who fight for our freedom. The freedom to choose what we eat, what we think, what we DRINK! I was born and raised in New York and I am appalled that this is even a consideration. It is not anyone's place in this country to dictate to another group of people what they can and cannot drink. Do not pass the limited soda consumption.

Sincerely

Re: Comments on the Proposed Amendment of Article 81 (Food Preparation and Food Establishments) of the New York City Health Code, found in Title 24 of the Rules of the City of New York

Dear Ms. Bryant:

The Washington Legal Foundation (WLF) welcomes the opportunity to offer its views on the Proposed Amendment of Article 81 regarding the maximum size of sugary drinks and self-service beverage cups sold and offered in food service establishments. WLF shares the New York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene's (DOHMH) concern regarding the risk factors associated with obesity and the increase in obesity levels in the United States. WLF appreciates the efforts of DOHMH and the Board of Health in considering options to reduce the level of obesity among New Yorkers. Although WLF commends DOHMH and the Board of Health for its initiative in seeking ways to reduce the obesity levels of the citizens of New York City, we have serious concerns about the proposed amendments.

WLF urges the Board of Health to carefully contemplate the economic and social impact of such an amendment on the citizens and businesses of, and visitors to, New York City. The proposed amendment will negatively impact consumers in New York City by reducing available drink size options and by requiring them to purchase multiple drinks to achieve the same quantities larger than 16 ounces that are available in New York City today.

Furthermore, the proposed amendment is certain to adversely impact businesses that are regulated by the New York State Department of Health (NYSDOH). Such businesses will be forced to comply with the proposed amendment. Competitors such as convenience stores and grocery stores that are regulated by the New York State Department of Agriculture and Markets

(NYSDOA) and that sell the same beverages included in the proposed amendment will be free to continue to sell the prohibited products.[1]

In addition to the adverse economic impacts that will likely result from the proposed amendment, there are substantial public policy factors such as consumer choice and individual liberty that should be carefully weighed. Furthermore, the Board of Health should carefully review all available scientific data regarding the correlation between "sugary drinks" and obesity to determine whether there is credible scientific evidence that the proposed amendment will achieve the stated goal of reducing obesity. The Board of Health should also consider whether the desired results can even be effectively tracked and measured.

Because there are important economic and social concerns in addition to health concerns, WLF questions whether the Board of Health has the authority under New York law to pass such a resolution without the assistance of the democratically-elected legislative body. WLF believes that under the important separation of powers provisions of New York law, New York City's legislative body, not the Board of Health, is best positioned to consider, weigh, and determine various options to address obesity, including any proposed legislation.

WLF encourages DOHMH and the Board of Health to consider whether the proposed amendment is a rational way to achieve the stated goal of reducing obesity among New York City residents since: (a) not all establishments that provide self-service "sugary" drinks in cups or containers larger than 16 ounces are included in the Proposed Ban; (b) consumers will have the option to purchase two drinks to equal more than 16 ounces; (c) consumers may still receive refills in an amount greater than 16 ounces; (d) consumers may purchase beverages with similar sugar content (such as milkshakes and alcohol) that are not included in the amendment; and (e) consumers may still add any amount of sugar or other sweetener they desire.

WLF shares the Board of Health's goal of drawing attention to and addressing the problem of obesity. WLF, however, believes that New York City can implement various ideas and programs that will more effectively reduce the obesity level of New Yorkers and that do so in a less intrusive and restrictive impact on consumers and businesses than the proposed amendment.

I. Interests of Washington Legal Foundation

WLF is a national public interest law and policy center located in Washington, D.C. WLF regularly appears before federal and state courts and administrative agencies to preserve and defend free market principles, a limited and accountable government, and individual and business liberties. It devotes a substantial portion of its resources to defending the rights of individuals and businesses to go about their affairs without undue interference from government regulators.

[1] The Memorandum of Understanding (MOU) between the NYSDOH and the NYSDOA was amended and executed by the Agencies' Commissioners effective September 20, 2010. Pursuant to the MOU, the NYSDOH is responsible for the "inspection and regulation of places where food is consumed on the premises or sold ready-to-eat for off-premises consumption including the site at which individual portions are provided" including, without limitation, restaurants, cafes, coffee shops, and cafeterias. The NYSDOA is responsible for the "inspection and regulation of places where food is processed or manufactured, food warehouses, wholesale food distributors and retail food stores" including, without limitation, food stores, convenience food plants, and delicatessens with food service less than 50% of annual sales.

WLF believes in individual freedom of choice and that paternalism towards adult consumers is rarely, if ever, warranted even when agencies such as DOHMH and the Board of Health desire to adopt resolutions for the noble intention of improving the health of its citizens. WLF urges governments--including municipal governments--to trust in the ability of consumers who receive truthful information to make decisions they believe are in their best interests. When adult consumers are provided truthful, health-related information and make decisions based on such information, individuals are accepting personal responsibility and society as a whole benefits. WLF suggests that the Board of Health respect the intelligence of its citizens to make the choices right for them when provided with truthful information.

II. Purposes of the Proposed Amendment

DOHMH identified a number of important reasons to justify a ban on an adult's freedom to choose. The Statement of Basis and Purpose in the above-referenced Notice of Public Hearing (Notice of Public Hearing) stated that more than half of New York City adults (58%) are now overweight or obese and more than 20% of the City's public school children (K-8) are obese.

To address the obesity epidemic among New York City's residents, DOHMH proposes that the Board of Health amend Article 81 of the Health Code, related to the maximum size of sugary drinks[2] and self-service beverage cups sold and offered in "food service establishments."[3] According to the proposed amendment, "[a] food service establishment may not sell or offer to sell a sugary drink in a cup or container that is able to contain more than 16 fluid ounces" and "[a] food service establishment may not sell or provide to any customer a self-service cup or container that is able to contain more than 16 fluid ounces" (collectively, the "Proposed Ban").

According to the Notice of Public Hearing, "a food service establishment determined to have violated this section will be subject to a fine of no more than two hundred dollars for each violation and no more than one violation of this section may be cited at each inspection of a food service establishment."

[2] In the proposed amendment, a "sugary drink" is defined as "a carbonated or non-carbonated beverage that: (A) is non-alcoholic; (B) is sweetened by the manufacturer or establishment with sugar or another caloric sweetener; (C) has greater than 25 calories per 8 fluid ounces of beverage; and (D) does not contain more than 50 percent of milk or milk substitute by volume as an ingredient."

[3] In Article 81 (Food Preparation and Food Establishments) of Title 24 Department of Health of the Official Rules of the City of New York a "food service establishment" is defined as "a place where food is provided for individual portion service directly to the consumer whether such food is provided free of charge or sold, whether consumption occurs on or off the premises or is provided from a pushcart, stand or vehicle." http://www.nyc.gov/html/doh/downloads/pdf/rats/article_81.pdf last visited on July 20, 2012.

III. Separation of Powers

While WLF appreciates the role the Board of Health plays in improving the health of New Yorkers, we believe the board will likely exceed its administrative authority if it adopts the Proposed Ban. The Board of Health is granted broad powers pursuant to N.Y.C. Charter § 558(b), which provides that "[t]he board of health from time to time may add to and alter, amend or repeal any part of the health code, and may therein publish additional provisions for security of life and health in the city and confer additional powers on the department not inconsistent with the constitution, laws of this state or this charter."

The separation of powers doctrine is clearly embodied in the New York State Constitution where it mandates that the "legislative power of this State shall be vested in the Senate and the Assembly." N.Y. Const., Art. III, § 1. Further, Section 21 of the New York City Charter provides that "[t]here shall be a council which shall be the legislative body of the city" and that the legislative power is vested with the council. N.Y.C. Charter § 21. Section 21 additionally provides that "[a]ny enumeration of powers in this charter shall not be held to limit the legislative power of the council, except as specifically provided in this charter."

In addition to such separation of powers provisions, guidance provided in Boreali v. Axelrod regarding the delegation of authority between the Board of Health and the city council is relevant to the consideration of the Proposed Ban. See Boreali v. Axelrod, 71 N.Y.2d 1, 517 N.E.2d 1350 (1987). The regulations at issue in Boreali were invalidated because the public health council was found to have overstepped its bounds and exercised legislative authority in that it:

(a) weighed "economic and social concerns" in addition to health concerns;
(b) "wrote on a clean slate, creating its own comprehensive set of rules without benefit of legislative guidance";
(c) "acted in an area in which the [New York] Legislature had repeatedly tried-and failed-to reach agreement in the face of substantial public debate"; and
(d) did not exercise any special expertise or technical competence in the field of health in drafting the "simple code" at issue. Boreali, 71 N.Y.2d at 8-14, 517 N.E.2d at 1353-57.

Importantly, one federal court has relied on only one of the Boreali factors in striking down proposed regulations. Nassau Bowling Proprietors Ass'n v. County of Nassau, 965 F. Supp. 376, 379-380 (E.D.N.Y. 1977). The court found that the board considered factors other than health factors and stated that although the board had the authority to regulate health matters, it was "improper" to weigh and balance other "significant concerns not within the ambit of authority delegated to the Board." Nassau Bowling, 965 F. Supp. at 380. Economic and social concerns should be evaluated in addition to health concerns to effectively analyze the impact of the Proposed Ban. As a result, the Board of Health will likely not be able to effectively create and implement such a ban without running afoul of the separation of powers limitations on its authority.

A. Weighing Economic and Social Concerns

Like the regulations at issue in Boreali, the Proposed Ban on large sugary beverages obviously implicates important economic and social concerns. Such a ban will clearly have an adverse economic impact on those businesses that rely on the sale of such products, as well as the producers and distributors of such products. Vendors have a right to earn a living from the production and sale of legal products, especially when those products can be legally purchased in smaller sizes.

Furthermore, the Proposed Ban will negatively impact manufacturers, distributors, and retailers of the prohibited cups and containers. The Proposed Ban specifies that "[a] food service establishment may not sell or provide to any customer a self-service cup or container that is able to contain more than 16 fluid ounces." (emphasis added) This definition is overinclusive because it arguably restricts the ability of coffee shops, cafes, and other NYSDOH-regulated establishments to sell, among other containers, coffee pots, thermoses, and tea pots that are "able to contain more than 16 fluid ounces." Many retailers now rely on the significant revenues associated with the sales of such equipment, accessories, and drinkware. The resulting loss of sales is certain to adversely impact the revenues of such manufacturers, distributors, and retailers as well as the revenues of New York City.

Manufacturers, distributors, and retailers of self-service cups will also be adversely affected. Although there might be an increase in the purchase of 16-ounce and smaller cups and containers, there is certain to be a loss of sales of cups and containers that hold more than 16 ounces. Many retailers offer a discount to consumers who purchase a reusable cup and return to the retailer for refills, which also benefits the environment. Those consumers who have previously purchased larger reusable cups will now be forced to purchase a 16-ounce or smaller reusable cup.

Consumers will be further impacted by the Proposed Ban because they will have to purchase two smaller drinks to receive a drink larger than 16 ounces. This will increase a consumer's total costs of purchasing self-service drinks. Moreover, consumers who purchase family meals that are available at some restaurants will no longer be able to receive the family-size (typically gallon) drinks that are usually offered.

The Proposed Ban may also reduce tourism in New York City. Given the state of the economy, families are more carefully considering total costs of holidays and vacations and some families may choose to visit cities other than New York City as they consider the possible increase in expenses associated with having to purchase more drinks.

The Proposed Ban will affect similarly-situated retailers and producers in an unfair fashion and likely put NYSDOH-regulated food establishments at a competitive disadvantage. Restaurants, coffee shops, and other food service establishments under the authority of NYSDOH will be affected by the Proposed Ban. Convenience stores, grocery store, and other businesses that sell self-service foods and beverages, however, are excluded from the Proposed Ban because they are regulated by the NYSDOA, and will remain free to sell the drinks included in the Proposed Ban. Additionally, the Proposed Ban does not apply to dairy-based drinks or alcoholic beverages even though such drinks likely contain more sugar than soft drinks, thus having a disparate impact on producers of similar products.

As evidenced by the state constitution, social concerns should also be considered in weighing the impact of the Proposed Ban. New York has historically championed individual freedoms, and the New York State Constitution states that "[e]very citizen may freely speak, write and publish his or her sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that right." N.Y. Const. art. 1, § 8. Because of such guarantees, New York City will certainly want to consider the impact of the Proposed Ban on individual choice and liberty.

An individual's freedom to exercise personal choice bolsters human dignity, responsibility, and fairness. Liberty underpins the American way of life and the U.S. Constitution--it is part of the American psyche. While WLF does not view the freedom to choose what one eats as a right equivalent to that of free speech, the freedom to choose what one eats has an immediate influence on both one's mental and physical quality of life. Preparing, serving, and eating food has important cultural and religious dimensions. While some serious threats to public health necessitate minimal restrictions on personal liberty such as those threats associated with products that scientists agree are bad in any quantity, soda and other drinks included in the Proposed Ban are not such products. In light of the individual liberty at stake, the Proposed Ban and the associated restrictions are not justified.

Because the weighing of "economic and social concerns" is a legislative not administrative function, the Board will have exceeded its authority by enacting the Proposed Ban. Such concerns, as Boreali makes clear, are the exclusive purview of the New York City Council.

B. Writing on a Clean Slate and Encroaching on Legislative Responsibilities

With regard to the second prong of the Boreali test, if the Board of Health passes the Proposed Ban it will not be "merely filling in the details of broad legislation describing the over-all policies to be implemented" but will rather be writing "on a clean slate, creating its own comprehensive set of rules without benefit of legislative guidance." Boreali, 71 N.Y.2d at 13, 517 N.E.2d at 1356. Because there has been increasing focus on obesity and the methods that may be used to address such a society-wide health problem, the legislative body should be tasked with resolving such a difficult social, health, and economic problem by weighing and debating various options and costs. WLF agrees with the opinion in Boreali that "[m]anifestly, it is the province of the people's elected representatives...to resolve difficult social problems by making choices among competing ends." Boreali, 71 N.Y.2d at 13, 517 N.E.2d at 1356.

C. Exercising No Special Health Expertise

Although obesity is certainly a health concern, it does not appear that any special expertise or technical competence in the field of health was exercised by the Board of Health in developing the details of the Proposed Ban. In light of the fact that drinks with sugar--such as alcohol and milkshakes--are not included in the proposal, that consumers may get multiple refills or purchase multiple drinks, and the implausibility of the Proposed Ban's ability to reduce obesity rates, it appears that the selection of drinks was not based on health and science but was instead arbitrary.

For the reasons discussed above, the New York City Council is the appropriate body to consider potential options to address the obesity issue in New York City. If the Boreali test is applied to the Proposed Ban, the Board of Health will likely be found to have exceeded its authority.

IV. Irrational Means to Reduce Obesity

The Proposed Ban is not a rational way to reduce the obesity of New York City citizens. While the Proposed Ban may negatively affect sales to consumers, a consumer has the option to purchase two drinks to equal more than 16 ounces and, thereby, circumvent the Board of Health's goal. In addition, an establishment subject to the Proposed Ban may be located next to a NYSDOA-regulated establishment that is not subject to the Proposed Ban. It does not seem rational for a consumer to be prohibited from purchasing a 20-ounce sugary drink at Starbucks or Subway but walk potentially next door to a 7-Eleven or other NYSDOA-controlled establishment and purchase a similar 20-ounce drink. Nor does it make much sense to restrict the purchase of some sugary drinks while allowing the purchase of other sugary drinks such as milk-based products and alcohol in larger amounts.

The validity of the Proposed Ban hinges on its effectiveness, but various studies challenge the link between soda consumption and obesity, as well as the ability of bans or taxes to decrease consumption. Any product ban should be squarely rooted in science and likely to solve the problem being addressed.

First, soda consumption has steadily declined--sugar-sweetened beverages make up only 7% of the average person's caloric intake--while obesity has steadily increased. Just last year, Diet Coke became the second most popular carbonated beverage in the United States. This alone should call into question the hyperbolic characterizations of soda. Scientific studies further undermine the contention that soda is responsible for the obesity epidemic. A study in the American Journal of Clinical Nutrition found "no association between sugar-sweetened beverage consumption, juice consumption, and adolescent weight gain over a 5-year period."[4]

Even if it is scientifically determined that soda consumption is largely responsible for obesity, it is unclear that a ban on large portions of such drinks, which effectively acts as a tax on marginal consumption, will ameliorate the problem. A study by Van Hook and Altman found that children with access to junk food (e.g., soft drinks, candy bars, and potato chips) at school were no heavier than those without.[5] Furthermore, a 2010 study funded by the Robert Woods Johnson Foundation found that even a 40% soda tax had no statistically significant effect on the weight of those in the lowest income quartile.[6] Instructively, tax hikes on alcohol and tobacco have the largest effect on the consumption of light users, rather than heavy users.[7]

These results are unsurprising given the likely human response to soda bans: sweet-toothed individuals will find another sweet product to satisfy their sugar fix. As an article from the American Journal of Preventative Medicine stated, "taxes on soft drinks may reduce soda consumption but increase the consumption of other beverages high in sugar and calories."[8] Not only may individuals turn to sugary substitutes in beverage form; restraint from soda consumption fosters the notion that "because they stopped drinking Coke, they are free to eat more cake."[9] The Journal of Public Economics found that a six-calorie reduction in calories consumed from soda was accompanied by an eight-calorie increase in milk consumption, and a two-calorie increase in juice drink consumption for young people, age 3-18.[10]

Behavioral economics suggests that most obese individuals know they are heavy, understand the nutritional value of the foods they eat, and have strong incentives to correct their behavior.[11] Bans are unlikely to change this very human behavior unless most unhealthy options are banned.

Human behavior in tandem with the loopholes included in the Proposed Ban call into question the effectiveness of a large sugary beverage ban. Such factors will undermine the ability of the amendment to effectuate change in consumption or obesity rates. Because there is no reliable and credible evidence that the Proposed Ban will reduce obesity, there can be no justification for imposing restrictions on individual freedom of choice.

V. Other Policy Considerations

The Proposed Ban, like all sin taxes, will act as a regressive tax that hurts the poorest segments of society the most. Poorer dietary habits tend to correlate to lower incomes, and thus taxes on "unhealthy" products tend to disproportionately affect lower-income households. Further, sin taxes are associated with other negative economic consequences. By design, for sin taxes to be effective they must decrease consumption of the targeted product. In doing so, sin taxes affect the jobs and livelihoods of those in the affected industries.

The threat to choice that the Proposed Ban presents seems minimal when considered in the context of just one product; but it sets a precedent with language that justifies bans on a panoply of other products that is dangerous. The reasons for banning large sugary beverages are indistinguishable from the reasons that would justify bans on alcohol, red meat, hot dogs, white bread, French fries, cookies, etc. All of these products are considered detrimental to one's health, and almost any product, with adequate misuse, could pose a health danger. There will be times, however, where reasonable people will disagree on the "badness" of a given food, and creating a precedent for food and beverage bans is especially dangerous where the link to obesity is suspect.

It has been reported that the Board of Health has already considered further bans on popcorn and milkshakes. It is easy to see how one ban can easily lead to another, and another, based on where disfavor lies at any given moment. It is foreseeable that an array of products will be taken from the shelves, and consumers' dietary choices will be heavily reduced. Eliminating disfavored products from consumers' selection of choices takes away from life's simple pleasures, such as a night out at the movies with family or friends, infrequent indulgences, or childhood associations with particular foods or beverages. Micro-managing the population's diet takes away from the joy of life.

VI. Less Intrusive, More Effective Means to Battle Obesity

A free society benefits when individuals are empowered with the freedom to make educated choices. Alternative means are available to New York City that would enhance rather than stifle individual choice. Public education efforts enable individuals to make informed food and beverage choices while preserving that right to choose. Such measures are far more consistent with our nation's values than an out-right ban. Such educational efforts could take the form of healthy lifestyle campaigns in the media or in schools, and consist of fact-based information about the causes and dangers of obesity. Schools, who oversee the most vulnerable segment of the population, could increase health and physical education programs, and provide outreach to parents. Such measures are consistent with schools' grant of authority.

Alternatively, the municipal government can create opportunities for individuals to make healthy lifestyle choices. For instance, more parks would provide more opportunity for physical and recreational activity. More drinking fountains would provide fresh water as an alternative to sugary beverages. Bike share programs promote physical fitness while providing the added benefit of alternative modes of transportation. Many of these efforts will be community based, so as to suit the needs, qualities, and landscapes of the local population. These measures enable individuals to make healthy choices of their own volition and are better suited to solving the obesity epidemic than a one-size-fits-all approach.

New York City can incentivize all food and beverage outlets to provide healthier options for consumers. New York City can also incentivize its citizens to eat healthier and lose weight.

Many reading programs implemented across the nation's libraries incentivize children to read during the summer months. Many times the best results are achieved with the proverbial carrot rather than the stick.

WLF applauds the Department of Health and the Board of Health for seeking to improve the health of New York City citizens. WLF appreciates the opportunity to provide the Board of Health our feedback and views on such an important topic. We encourage the board to carefully consider the negative economic, social, and behavioral impacts that are likely to result from the Proposed Ban.

WLF believes the Board of Health can positively impact the obesity levels of New Yorkers through less restrictive means such as education, exercise programs targeting at adults as well as children, facilities for such programs, and healthy school lunch options.

Dear Health Board Members,

As a nutrition educator and advocate for healthy living, I support the 16 ounce soda limit – Article 81. Given that more than two-thirds of US adults and one-third of children are overweight or obese, it is imperative that leaders like Mayor Bloomberg and other New York City officials take a stand and help promote healthy options. I have seen first-hand the impact that obesity has on the health and well-being of adults and children alike. While I work to educate the public on the importance of healthy eating and physical activity, there is only so much I and other educators and advocates can do or say. Efforts like those taking place in New York City, like menu labeling and trans fat bans have proven to be successful – New York City's average life expectancy is now three years greater than the US average. Such efforts compliment the messages and education tactics that nutritionists and registered dietitians like myself use to help consumers practice healthy eating guidelines every day. We need these policies and environmental supports. Placing limits on the amount of sugary beverages that can be purchased in certain locations is a sensible step forward in the city's ongoing and effective efforts to address health care costs and promote a healthier environment for all residents. And it is an important tool for educators as they help residents be more informed about and capable of making healthy choices. Given that sugary drinks are the biggest contributor to the excess calories added to the diet since the 1970s, and the primary source of added sugars in children's diets, it is no wonder that with every additional sugary beverage a child drinks daily, the odds of becoming obese increase by 60%. ▯▯

While I don't live in New York City, I would benefit from New York City adopting Mayor Bloomberg's proposal to limit the size of sugary drinks sold in food service establishments. I work with health advocates and leaders at the federal, state and local levels to address the escalating health care costs related to obesity and excess calorie intake, and I look forward to advancing approaches like those taken in New York City to other areas across the country.

I support Mayor Bloomberg's proposal and urge you to approve it. ▯▯

Sincerely,

Tracy A. Fox

To whom it may concern,

I'm all for creating programs to help people overcome obesity, but to impose your will on people by taking away their right to purchase a Medium or Large drink is out of control. Focus your efforts on opening more city gyms, or creating programs in city parks where instructors can have cardio classes. By approving this plan, you are opening the doors to a world issues. What's going to happen next????? Will there be bans on certain foods????? What about Candies???? Will those disappear too????

Let people make their own choices. No one has the right to tell me how much drink or food I should consume. And to force me to spend extra money at the already expensive concession stands so that my wife and I can have our own drink (rather than share 1 drink) is ridiculous.

Don't let this ban go through.

I am writing in support of Mayor Bloomberg's proposal to limit the size of sodas sold in some venues in NYC as an important public health measure, specifically related to oral health.

Aside from poor oral hygiene, the primary culprit of tooth decay is too much sugar.

Specifically in young children, the consumption of sugar sweetened beverages has caused an increase in the number of children seeking extensive dental care, and at earlier ages. Recent research into SSB, which are the primary source of added sugar in young children's diets, shows that soda consumption by young children causes the greatest risk of dental disease among this cohort.

Though reducing soda volume in some venues in NYC will not be a silver bullet in mitigating dental disease, it is a major first step. The most important function of the reduction in beverage size will be to educate the public about what an appropriate serving size is of a beverage that has no nutritional value and packed with sugar. As we see soda serving volumes escalate, the public is lead to believe this is an appropriate serving. This misinformation is particularly harmful to young children who are susceptible to caries and have an affinity for sugar.

Harm is particularly more profound among our poorest populations, where we see higher consumption of sugared beverages and subsequently earlier and more extensive levels of tooth decay.

Mayor Bloomberg's efforts are a step in the right direction to improving the oral health of NYC's children, and will hopefully serve as a model for other communities to adopt like so many other of the Mayor's public health proposals.

Please feel free to contact me if you have any questions.

Opinion on Proposed Rule: Against

Comment: I would like to raise my opposition to the proposed sugary drink ban.
My perspective focuses mainly on the general issue of the power of the city government.
I feel that a government, be it local, state, or federal has no right to make decisions such as this for individuals. This proposed rule centers around a personal choice, whose consequences affect only the individual performing them.
Life is full of challenges, and the manner in which we meet and deal with those challenges is how we grow as individuals. This rule, (which is not even to be passed through a legislative body), takes away a personal choice, hence a personal chance to grow and evolve (we know that constantly drinking sugar is not healthy), ergo, the government is taking away another chance for me to live my life as an individual.
I am not, of course, like most of us opposing this rule, writing because I have a love affair with sugary drinks. I write because I know that this is not something any governmental agency has a right to undertake, and the fact that it is being proposed more by decree than by legislative means adds insult to injury.

Statement of support/written comments from the Mary Mitchell Center.

Because the Mary Mitchell Center has been focused on addressing the Health Crisis in our neighborhood that is related to what we eat and how much we exercise, I support the Mayor's proposal to limit the serving size of sugary drinks. It is not enough to address the significant problems in the Bronx which are directly related to high rates of poverty but it better than nothing.

Board of Health Public Hearing
Tuesday, July 24th at 1pm
2 Gotham Center, Room 3-32
Long Island City, NY 11101-4132

"Obesity and obesity related illnesses are and rightfully should be a growing concern to all New Yorkers. However, dictating what can and cannot be eaten and eliminating the ability to purchase large size beverages is not the solution to the health issues that plague our city. Disregarding the inconsistent application of the proposed ban and the ease in which the ban could be subverted, the proposal is in conflict with the fundamental rights of our constituents: their right to choose. Clearly, some people choose unhealthy food on a regular basis for themselves and their families. However, eliminating their ability to choose will not result in the necessary lifelong commitment that is required to stay healthy.

We must educate the citizens of New York City and ensure that they have access to affordable, healthy foods and recreational space. That is why, for example, I have worked hard in my district in Brooklyn to establish two greenmarket locations. My constituents now have an opportunity to choose farm-fresh fruits and vegetables on a weekly basis. That is the type of effort government should make; rather than the heavy hand of a Mayor's edict. If we do not use government's ability to use media outlets to educate on the dangers of high sugar intake and then provide New Yorkers the opportunity to make better choices with fresh and health alternatives, New Yorkers will remain sedentary, they will buy two sodas, they will mix large pitchers of tea and juice in their own homes and they will continue to make unhealthy choices outside of the city and at their dinner tables because it is their right to do so.

New Yorkers have proven time and time again that they are smart, resilient people. They know what is healthy and they know what is not. This was proven by data collected after caloric information was required to be posted at eateries around the city; when our constituents were faced with the facts, they made healthier choices. But for some reason, perhaps, out of necessity, they have turned to food and drinks with minimal nutritional value and excess sugar and fat. It is those reasons, the reasons that lead to choosing chips over apples or soda over water that must be attacked and eradicated, not our constituent's right to choose."

Sincerely,

Vincent J. Gentile

Subject: Written Comment on Proposed Amendment to Article 81: Food Preparation & Food Service Establishments (the "Sugary Drink Portion Size" Proposal)

July 19, 2012

As obesity rates continue to rise around the country, New York City offers a glimmer of hope. A recent analysis from the NYC Department of Health and Mental Hygiene found the largest documented decline of 5.5 percent over five years in obesity rates of schoolchildren in K-8 public schools.[1] Furthermore, the life expectancy of New York City's residents has increased by 10 years between 1987 and 2009, the biggest increase of any U.S. county nationwide.[2] Not insignificant, these positive changes are the result of policies—such as school food policies, the trans fat ban, and mandated calorie postings—aimed at nudging individuals toward consumption of healthier food and beverage options. They point to the success of the City's coordinated and concerted effort to get serious and lead the country in reducing obesity rates.

Obesity-related health care costs are placing an increasingly high burden on our health care system and overall economy. Currently, an estimated $223.5 billion[3] is spent annually on obesity-related illnesses, or 21% of annual medical spending. The costs to businesses are also staggering—a loss of $4.3 billion annually is a direct result of job absenteeism due to obesity. The Institute of Medicine (IOM) recently estimated that by the year 2030, 42 percent of the country will become obese—or 32 million additional people. If we choose to ignore the issue and let the market lead the way, these numbers will quickly become a reality.

Nearly half of this $223.5 billion dollar figure is paid for through Medicaid and Medicare, which are funded by taxpayer money at the state and federal levels. For each obese patient compared to a normal weight patient, on average, Medicare pays $1,723 more, and Medicaid pays $1,021 more per year on inpatient and outpatient services, and prescription drugs. The costs to private insurers are similar, at $1,140 on average annually.[4] These figures do not even begin to account for the uninsured, who are more likely to wait until serious health problems develop before making a visit to the emergency room where costs per visit are generally three times higher than comparable care in an outpatient setting.[5] To put this in context, in 2007, New York State enrolled 9 million Medicaid and/or Medicare patients.[6] Approximately 3.3 million of its over 5 million Medicaid enrollees reside in New York City,[7] and 75 percent of these enrollees have one or more chronic health conditions attributable to obesity, including diabetes and heart disease.[8]

Portion sizes are an obvious factor in the rapid increases in obesity rates. Studies have shown that individuals will often eat past the point of satiety when foods are not portioned.[9] Furthermore, 20 percent of the weight increase between 1977 and 2007 has been attributed to sugar-sweetened beverages.[10] This increase has occurred alongside increases in serving sizes from 13 ounces in 1977, to 20 ounces in 1996, resulting in an increase of 50 calories per serving.[11]

The recent New York City proposal to limit the maximum beverage size is a step in the right direction. Critics of the proposal frame it as an issue of personal choice and freedoms—but when personal choices lead to societal burdens that are as serious as those resulting from obesity, it becomes a societal responsibility. The City acted responsibly in 2005 by enacting the trans fat ban, which similar to soda, is linked to obesity and heart disease. The policy has successfully reduced the amount of overall fat consumed by New Yorkers.[12] Other counties and states are now following the City's leading example out of concern for the health of their populations.

We need to take action and implement measures that will reduce the harmful effects of obesity on the individual, the economy, and the health care system. To even begin to chip away at the problem requires a drastic overhaul of current policies and societal behaviors. The IOM's roadmap to change includes the recommendation to "create food and beverage environments that ensure that healthy food and beverage options are a routine, easy choice."[13] The maximum beverage size proposal seeks to do just that. By reorienting consumers and guiding them in their beverage choices, we can reduce the amount of sugar-sweetened beverages consumed by New York City residents. Because consumers are price sensitive, they may opt out of buying two drinks with the new regulation in place, as the cost of two 16-ounce drinks would presumably be higher than the price of a current single 32-ounce drink. I would caution, however, that food service establishments could potentially respond by marketing packaged 2-for-1 deals, unlimited refills, or pricing products that could circumvent the regulation's intent. I urge the City to include language in the regulation that would address this issue.

Ultimately, the proposal is not taking away choice—consumers still have the option of purchasing larger beverages in many other locations. They are still free to consume whatever type or amount of beverages they desire. Given the downstream costs to the health care system, and concern for the health of the economy and population, I am in full support of the proposed legislation to limit beverage sizes in select food service establishments as one important and significant way to address obesity rates.

Comment: The epidemics of obesity and type 2 diabetes are complex and require solutions on many fronts. However, the evidence linking intake of sugar-sweetened beverages to these diseases is strong and undeniable, so any measure to limit intake of these beverages including NYCs plan to restrict the serving size of soda and other sugary beverages at restaurants, movie theatres and street vendors is a good thing and represents an important step in the right direction.

Comment:	As an worker in NYC , I am writing you today to ask that you please reject the proposed ban on the sale of fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces.

Restricting the sale of certain beverage sizes in New York City hurts our restaurants, theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks, street carts, and all those who are dependent on beverage sales for their livelihoods.

Furthermore, I believe it should be up to me, and not my government, to choose my serving sizes. The answer to curbing obesity is diet, exercise, and a healthy lifestyle, not restrictions on soft drinks, juice drinks, sports drinks, and teas.

On behalf of New Yorkers like me, please say No to the proposed ban on the sale of beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

Comment:
How about unbundling the sale of soda and food? There could be a prohibition on their sale as a package.

How about requiring that water be served with food (unless the customer requests to opt-out)? Self-serve machines dont dispatch water and no drinking cup is given unless you buy a drink.

NATIONAL RESTAURANT ASSOCIATION

July 24, 2012

New York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene
Board of Health
Office of the Secretary to the Board
Attention: Rena Bryant
2 Gotham Center, 14th floor, Room 14-15, Box 31

Dear Ms. Bryant:

The National Restaurant Association appreciates the opportunity to provide comment on the proposed Amendment of Article 81 (Food Preparation and Food Establishments) of the New York City Health Code, found in Title 24 of the Rules of the City of New York.

The National Restaurant Association is the leading business association for the restaurant and foodservice industry which is comprised of 970,000 restaurant and foodservice outlets employing 13.1 million people who serve 130 million guests daily. The Association represents more than 435,000 member restaurant establishments. Restaurateurs are job creators. Despite being an industry of predominately small businesses, the restaurant industry is the nation's second-largest private-sector employer, employing almost 10 percent of the U.S. workforce.

Food and healthy living are priorities for our ever-growing industry. Restaurants have employed and continue to employ a wide range of strategies to play a positive role in reversing the trend of obesity, including adding more healthful items to menus and disclosing nutrition information so that consumers may choose foods that meet their preferences and diet. Through these efforts, the restaurant industry has seen consumer demand for healthful and nutritional items increase, both among children and adults.

The restaurant industry in New York is integral to the economy and job creation. In fact, every $1 spent in New York's restaurants generates an additional $0.86 in sales for the economy and every extra $1 million spent in New York's restaurants generates an additional 20.2 jobs in the state. It is also important to note that New York City has a particularly high number of eating and drinking establishments, and thus, a high number of restaurant employees with the overwhelming majoring being affected by Bloomberg's proposed ban on maximum size of sugary beverages and self-service beverage cups sold.

While we commend Mayor Bloomberg on his efforts to combat obesity, we firmly believe his proposed Amendment of Article 81 of the New York City Health Code is not an effective strategy. Unfortunately, there is no magic bullet in America's fight against obesity, and regulation such as this proposed Amendment misplaces responsibility and creates a false sense of accomplishment. Instead of demonizing sugar-sweetened beverages in restaurants and foodservice establishments in an attempt to reverse the obesity epidemic, we collectively must focus on policies and practices where there is evidence to indicate there will be a consumer behavioral change which leads to positive health outcomes.

Mayor Bloomberg's Proposed Amendment to Article 81 Lacks Scientific Evidence

Before the Mayor adopts health related policies, especially policies that will significantly impact consumer freedom and economic trade, we believe science should demonstrate the effectiveness of such policies. Obesity is a complex problem that is influenced by many factors, most importantly diet, exercise and genetics. To blame sugar sweetened beverages as the cause of obesity lacks scientific basis. The 2010 Dietary Guidelines Advisory report states "Limited evidence shows that intake of sugar sweetened beverages is linked to higher energy intake in adults." The report also highlights that research indicates added sugars, including the sugar provided in sugar sweetened beverages are no more likely to cause weight gain than any other source of calories. Data from the United States Department of Health's Center for Disease Control (CDC) indicates that sugar drinks account between 5-8% of daily caloric intake with 50% of the population not consuming any sugary drinks. Moreover, added sugar (grams/day) from soda, consumption has decreased by 39% over the last decade (Am J Clin Nutr, 2011). More specifically nearly 75% of NYC adults do not frequently consume sugar sweetened soda (J Urban Health, 2008). In the aggregate, this data demonstrates that calories from sugar sweetened beverages are a small fraction of the American and even NYC diet. Additionally, CDC data indicates that most of the sugar drinks consumed away from home are not obtained in restaurants, but rather from stores. Thus, there is no scientific basis to demonstrate that restricting the size of beverage containers for sugary drinks or setting a caloric limit of greater than 25 calories per 8 ounces in restaurants will have any demonstrable impact on obesity, especially when the majority of people purchase their sugary drinks from convenience and grocery stores that are excluded from the Mayor's proposal.

As mentioned previously nearly 75% of NYC residents do no consume one or more 12 ounces serving of sugar sweetened soda per day. It was found that men were more likely than women to be frequent soda consumers; however, only among women was soda consumption associated with an increased body mass index (BMI) and this was only found to be an increase of 0.7 BMI units. In addition it was found that sedentary behavior (lack of physical activity, watching 2 or more hours of television per day) was associated with frequent soda consumption showing that unhealthy lifestyle behaviors tend to cluster and that confounding by unmeasured lifestyle factors may explain the association between soda consumption and a slight increase in BMI among women (J Urban Health, 2008).

In addition, this proposed Amendment does not just target soda but many beverages that are commonly consumed not just in NYC but nationwide, such as certain prepared coffee, teas, smoothies, lemonades and much more. Yet, the ban exempts milkshakes and alcoholic beverages. There is no scientific justification for what is and what is not included in the proposed ban including the caloric limit. There is no scientific evidence for a caloric limit of 25 calories per 8 ounces. These random limitations continue to reflect how this proposal is biased without scientific substantiation to support it.

Mayor Bloomberg's Ban Arbitrarily Discriminates Against Restaurants

As previously mentioned, CDC research indicates only between 5-8% of total calories are obtained from sugary drinks and interestingly enough, restaurants are not the major contributor. Yet, New York City's eateries are being unfairly singled out to ration portion sizes of single beverage servings. CDC data does demonstrate that the majority of sugary beverages consumed outside of the home are obtained from grocery and convenience stores, yet these types of establishments are not subject to the Mayor's proposed restrictions. We question what is the rational basis for singling out restaurants when the majority of individuals obtain their sugary beverages from grocery stores/convenience stores, which are not included in the proposed ban? Moreover, restaurateurs are primarily small business owners. Thus, small businesses restaurant owners will most definitely suffer from the Mayor's proposal while the ban will have no impact on convenience and grocery stores. Due to the economic impact that this ban will have on restaurants, we are concerned that restaurants will potentially have to eliminate jobs in a tough economy and limit their expansion.

Unfortunately, the proposed limitations on beverage sizes are another example of New York City's Department of Health consistent targeting of restaurants for excessive regulation in recent years. New York has recently placed bureaucratic mandates and a letter-grade health inspection system on the restaurant industry that even some City Council members have called unfair and inconsistent. We would like to highlight one of the potential absurdities of the beverage ban proposal and how it can impact the pizza industry. This sector of the industry delivers food for families, friends or co-workers to enjoy as a shared meal. The majority of their menu items are shareable (e.g. an order of breadsticks, chicken wings, a large pizza, a 2 Liter of soda, etc.). If this proposal is passed a delivery of a shareable meal would now have to include individual 12 ounce cans of soda for every person. That is an expensive waste of money for the customer and a logistical nightmare for the driver delivering the meal and beverages. This is just one example of the far reaching implications of this proposal.

We urge public health officials in New York to put all of their energies into public education about a balanced lifestyle including a proper diet and exercise rather than attempting to regulate consumption of a completely legal and safe product enjoyed universally at restaurants.

Mayor Bloomberg's Ban is a Slippery Slope

Mayor Bloomberg's proposed ban has been highly publicized in the media as a "soda ban" and is commonly known as "a ban on Big Gulps." Many individuals are not recognizing the fact that this ban applies to beverages beyond simply soda. The ban extends to any beverage (exclusive of milkshakes and alcoholic drinks) with more than 25 calories per 8 ounces, and thus, even those who do not drink soda have reason for concern. As mentioned previously, the ban would include some coffees, teas, smoothies, lemonades and much more. Ultimately, the general public has been misled and misunderstands the true implementations of this ban, which is unacceptable. This point also highlights the idea that if the Board of Health wants to limit such a wide range of beverages, there is no end to what other limitations they can place on the dining public.

Mayor Bloomberg is Attempting to Legislate with Regulation

It is widely understood that elected officials have the job of setting policies, while administrative officials on the other hand have the job of implementing those policies. Mayor Bloomberg seems to have a different idea in the way he is attempting to implement his proposed beverage ban. By running this ban through the Board of Health, Bloomberg is circumventing the legislative process. He is attempting to create his own comprehensive set of rules without the benefit of legislative guidance, which is simply unacceptable. Even under the broadest and most open-ended of statutory mandates, an administrative agency (such as the Board of Health) may not use its authority as a license to correct whatever societal detriments it perceives. Ultimately, Bloomberg has transgressed the line between administrative rule-making and legislative policy-making through his attempted implementation of this ban. A decision this large that will impact every single citizen of the city does not belong in the hands of unelected bureaucrats.

Mayor Bloomberg's Ban Unjustifiably Limits the Freedom of New Yorkers

Through this proposed ban, Mayor Bloomberg unjustifiably is infringing on personal freedom and choices. The NYC Board of Health needs to give the people of New York more credit and allow them to make their own decisions. Citizens are not wards of the state – they are entitled to the freedom to choose what they consume and how much. Regulation is the not the best approach for decreasing disease rates, including obesity. There is little empirical data on the public health impacts and other costs and benefits to this type of approach. In a diverse city like NYC, we have seen strong unity in opposition to this among New Yorkers. In fact, over 90,000 signatures have been collected to demonstrate strong opposition to this proposal.

Finally, the National Restaurant Association recognizes that there is a responsibility and a role for local officials in public health matters, but we do not believe that engaging in paternalistic efforts such as the Mayor's plan – which misplaces responsibility on some small business operators, impedes commerce, creates an uneven playing field from a business perspective, and produces a false sense of accomplishment in the fight against obesity – is the correct way to engage on this issue. Ultimately, this proposed ban is unjustly focused on sugar sweetened beverages and is biased without scientific substantiation. The Board of Health's focus should be on education around a total, balanced diet and active lifestyle. Science and research continues to point to the need for broad-based solutions and a comprehensive approach to address the obesity epidemic.

Sincerely,

Scott DeFife, Executive Vice President of Policy & Government Affairs, National Restaurant Association

Joy Dubost PhD RD CSSD
Director of Nutrition, National Restaurant Association

Joan Rector McGlockton
Vice President of Industry Affairs and Food Policy, National Restaurant Association

Rule: Article 81 - Food Preparation and Food Service Establishments

Opinion on Proposed Rule: Against

Comment: I preface this by stating that I AM NOT A SUGARY DRINK Consumer. Nor do I eat at Fast Food Chains.

However, It is NOT for the Mayor, City or the State or any branch of Government for that matter to dictate to the people what they can and can not eat or drink!!!!

If Mayor Bloomberg is so concerned about peoples health why doesnt he go after the Coca Colas and Red Bulls of the world? Why isnt the government requiring them to use healthier ingredients or modify their recipes? Why arent we demanding that these companies provide healthier products? Why arent we restricting the ENERGY DRINK companies? They are selling these heart attacks in a bottle to CHILDREN!!! But no one is talking about that. there is no money in NOT selling something is there? ONLY IN TAXING AND VIOLATIONS!

Why is the City of NY always attacking the people and small business?

Because MAYOR BLOOMBERG along with MOST OF OUR POLITICIANS are COMPLETELY OUT OF TOUCH WITH THE PEOPLE thats why!

This proposed rule is no more than another one of Bloombergs and NYCs TAX. Its ridiculous and will not help with obesity it will only push people to buy two 16oz sodas. Maybe that is what this rule is really about.
Maybe this rule is about selling MORE SODA not less!

Obesity in this country is due to the Fast Food chain mentally. One in which Bloomberg has helped prosper in the city of NY. BIG BUSINESS instead of mom pops. Fast Food chain and Banks instead of small local restaurants and stores.

Every day the City of New York kills off more and more local small business. Business that create jobs and take care of their community that try to provide good products to the people around them.

THAT is whats wrong with this City, not the size of the Sodas at Mc Donalds.

If the city did not make it so easy for mc donalds to open on EVERY corner then maybe we wouldnt even be talking about this.

Comment:	I agree with trying to limit the calories of people who may not know any better but this rule is unfair and will substantially hurt fast food restaurants. This rule should include bodegas and grocery stores. Example I could go into my favorite fast food restaurant (Subway), order my favorite low fat sandwich and only be able to get a 16 ounce diet Coke. Or I could go next door and get a 64 ounce Big Gulp of Dr. Pepper with 1200 calories in it. It just doesnt make sense that it doesnt apply to every place you can get a drink equally. Say what you want about fast food restaurants but its not always junk food, they employ tens thousands of people, and provide a living for thousands of entrepreneurs in NYC.

Rule: Article 81 - Food Preparation and Food Service Establishments

First Name: Payton

Last Name: Taylor

Opinion on Proposed Rule: Against

Comment: I am writing in response to the proposed changes to Article 81.
These proposed changes are completely ludicrous. By making "sugary drinks" have a maximum size of 16 ounces is completely un-necessary.
Putting a maximum on a drink size is only going to generate horrible customer service for businesses and due to the large number of dissatisfied customers; those businesses are at risk of losing revenue. I maybe wrong, but everyone should be working together right now to improve the economy and to make New York City better. Smaller connivance stores as well as large venues could and will suffer financially from losing some of their drink options.
Think of all of the stadiums and arenas within the New York City limits. According to these proposed changes, they will no longer be able to sell some of their most popular drink items due to them being over 16 ounces. At a stadium event, customers rely on the "jumbo" drinks for numerous reasons. The jumbo drinks allow families to share one drink instead of purchasing numerous drinks. Also, at sporting events the customers like to watch what they just paid a ticket price to see. The jumbo drink allows them remain seated without making trips back and forth to the concessions and waiting in line.
I understand the reasoning behind it the proposed changes, but it seems like the government will be doing more harm than good to their hard working, taxpaying citizens.
Quite frankly, I do not even know how much this proposal of changes is costing in wasted taxpaying dollars. Instead of focusing on the horrors of soda and sugar drinks, you should really be concentrating on how to get people to stop smoking and getting them not to start in the first place. When it comes to nutrition, all anyone can do is teach America's youth and hope that their parents instill good eating habits in their children.
If you can show me a study that shows people got diabetes or died from drinking too many jumbo sugar drinks, I will sincerely apologize; however, my guess is that overall poor nutrition and too many value meals were also a factor in the diagnosis.

If you put a maximum size on so called "sugary" drinks what is next? Limit how many Big Macs, large fries, and value meals one can purchase from fast food chains? What about the candy bars that are "king sized"?

Rule:	Article 81 - Food Preparation and Food Service Establishments
First Name:	Payton
Last Name:	Taylor
Email:	mandaleigh9@gmail.com
Opinion on Proposed Rule:	Against
Comment:	I am writing in response to the proposed changes to Article 81.

These proposed changes are completely ludicrous. By making "sugary drinks" have a maximum size of 16 ounces is completely un-necessary.
Putting a maximum on a drink size is only going to generate horrible customer service for businesses and due to the large number of dissatisfied customers; those businesses are at risk of losing revenue. I maybe wrong, but everyone should be working together right now to improve the economy and to make New York City better. Smaller connivance stores as well as large venues could and will suffer financially from losing some of their drink options.
Think of all of the stadiums and arenas within the New York City limits. According to these proposed changes, they will no longer be able to sell some of their most popular drink items due to them being over 16 ounces. At a stadium event, customers rely on the "jumbo" drinks for numerous reasons. The jumbo drinks allow families to share one drink instead of purchasing numerous drinks. Also, at sporting events the customers like to watch what they just paid a ticket price to see. The jumbo drink allows them remain seated without making trips back and forth to the concessions and waiting in line.
I understand the reasoning behind it the proposed changes, but it seems like the government will be doing more harm than good to their hard working, taxpaying citizens.
Quite frankly, I do not even know how much this proposal of changes is costing in wasted taxpaying dollars. Instead of focusing on the horrors of soda and sugar drinks, you should really be concentrating on how to get people to stop smoking and getting them not to start in the first place. When it comes to nutrition, all anyone can do is teach America's youth and hope that their parents instill good eating habits in their children.
If you can show me a study that shows people got diabetes or died from drinking too many jumbo sugar drinks, I will sincerely apologize; however, my guess is that overall poor nutrition and too many value meals were also a factor in the diagnosis.

If you put a maximum size on so called "sugary" drinks what is next? Limit how many Big Macs, large fries, and value meals one can purchase from fast food chains? What about the candy bars that are "king sized"?

Comment:	I am against the limit of 16oz on soda for the practical reason that as an operator who serves fountain soda, a large portion of the cup is filled with ice and is thus watering down the beverage to begin with. Most people who purchase fountain soda do so because they want a ready to drink, cold beverage with ice. Additionally, in order to provide a good value to the customer, I cannot sell them something that effectively has less product in the same size serving: My 16oz fountain soda contains approximately 11ozs of soda and 5 ozs of ice. Consumers will know this and opt to go to the grocery store instead, in order to get a full 16oz serving. This rule does not take into account those of us who sell fountain soda with ice already in it and unfairly disadvantages us in the marketplace,

Dear New York City Board of Health,

The action of NYC to regulate what size soda the people can buy is ludicrous. It reeks of Nazi Germany, Stalin's Russia and Mao's China. Government needs to back off. Get out of people's private lives and personal decision making needs to be left to the individual.

Besides, thinking that limiting a soda size is just dumb. People will buy two, three or four to get what they want. It will just cost them more. People who want sugary snacks will buy candy bars and head over to get a greasy hamburger and French fries.

Next Bloomberg will be identifying individuals, who he thinks will be better off with a lobotomy. Where will government meddling end?

Be careful, you may wake up one morning to find that last innocent law is the one that took away your right to vote.

Sincerely,

Charles J. Smyth

Board of Health Public Hearing 7/24/12: NYC Size Restriction of Sugary Beverages

Statement from Assemblyman Felix W. Ortiz - representing the 51st Assembly District (Sunset Park/Park Slop/Red Hook)

Assemblyman Felix W. Ortiz, Chair of the NYS Assembly Mental Health Committee, has fought hard over the years to protect the lives and health of New Yorkers. Overcoming obesity is one of the many issues that the Assemblyman has been working on over the past decade. The road to overcoming obesity has been a long and arduous one, but by restricting the size of sugary beverages sold in NYC, we are one step closer to overcoming this deleterious epidemic.

As a member of the New York State Assembly, Felix Ortiz has been fighting hard to pass bills that fight against the obesity epidemic that is especially evident in New York City. In 2003, nearly a decade ago, Assemblyman Ortiz introduced one of the first bills of its kind; the Nutrition Labeling Bill requires restaurants to provide nutrition information on their menus. When this bill was first introduced, the Assemblyman was criticized; his opponents claiming that this information on menus was ridiculous and unnecessary; however, now you will see the nutritional values of food at restaurants all across the country.

Much like the Nutrition Labeling Bill, restricting the size of sugary non-alcoholic beverages at restaurants will eventually be seen as a concept of common sense. Extremely large quantities of sugary drinks that are sold at restaurants will be a source of ridicule for said food establishments. There are some food establishments within the City of New York that serve customers sugary beverages with sizes up to 64 fluid ounces, served with 780 calories and 54 teaspoons of sugar. These are astounding numerical facts that we need to change for the better. Furthermore, we now know that sugary beverages are the only product directly linked to obesity. Limiting the size of these beverages will limit the number of obese individuals in our city and ultimately save our health care systems hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Representing the 51st Assembly district in Brooklyn which covers Sunset Park, Park Slope and the surrounding neighborhoods, Assemblyman Félix Ortiz represents many low-income families. Healthy foods tend to be more expensive than sugary, manufactured goods; however, by consuming these detrimental foods on a daily basis, one can worsen one's health. The New York City Health Department issued a report that stated that a child from a low-income family that is under two years old has a one-in-four chance of becoming obese; these statistics increase to a one-in-three chance by the time the child is four years old. These odds are not fair to the numerous low-income families who cannot afford to buy healthful, beneficial foods.

We need to help these children have a better chance for a healthier life; one that is not plagued by diabetes or obesity. We can make positive changes by getting rid of these large drinks with enormous sugar content. We cannot hope to overcome the obesity epidemic solely by reducing the size of sugary drinks, but this is an important step that will help us beat obesity and make us a healthier nation. By keeping these large, sugary drinks on restaurants' menus, we will be walking on a path where our children will have a lower life expectancy than ours. It is much easier and cheaper to prevent obesity and diabetes than it is to treat these two epidemics that affect so many people within not only New York City, but the entire nation. Let us take this necessary step to curb the spread of obesity and diabetes by preventing them and not just by treating them, one of the ways to do this being to limit the size of sugary drinks. Public health issues are serious issues that affect every person, so let us continue to make progress against such devastating epidemics such as obesity and diabetes.

NO to amending Art. 81

O'Dell R.S. Farley [justsyd@earthlink.net]
Sent: Monday, July 23, 2012 4:07 PM
To: Resolution Comments

307

The proposed amendment to Article 81 of the health code arrogantly assumes that no New Yorker can intelligently determine how much beverage they should buy. That is the start down a slippery slope that will lead to the city trying to tell ostensibly free people what they can and cannot eat.

My family and I are not frequent consumers of sugared beverages. The soft drink companies would not make much of a profit if they depended entirely on customers like us. However, I can think of a number of occasions when one of us have purchased a soft drink larger than 16 oz. from one of the kinds of establishments that would be affected by this ban.

For example, when my husband and I go to the movies, we purchase 1 combo of a soft drink and popcorn -- TO SHARE! When our son was a youngster, on the rare occasions when we ate at a fast food establishment, we sometimes purchased a large softdrink and asked for an empty small cup, to limit his portion size. WE DID THAT ALL ON OUR OWN, HOW ABOUT THAT! I recently witnessed parents doing exactly the same thing in a McDonald's.

This proposed ban is ridiculous. It will only cause people to pay more and carry more, and will hit those who can least afford the extra expense the hardest. It is a TAX no matter what you call it! Do you realize that if this ban is passed someone could order an extra large 3 meat extra cheese pizza from a city establishment to eat on their own, but you would prevent them from buying more than 16 oz. of soda? How ridiculous! You do not know what anyone will do with a beverage or any other edible they purchase, nor will you, unless you are planning on having food police stationed throughout the city.

Education is the answer to the obesity epidemic! Has no one noticed the childhood obesity level began to rise when cooking classes disappeared from the public schools? There are parents out there who do not know how to cook, or whose skills are severely limited. They could use some education, too!

Instead of using the power of the city to annoy ordinary citizens, how about this? Use city zoning and tax incentives to ensure that every citizen has access to a supermarket that sells fresh wholesome affordable food. Encourage small greengrocers to move into underserved neighborhoods, and discourage the conversion of small supermarkets to banks and chain drugstores! Limit the number of fast food restaurants that can open in any neighborhood. Join with the education department to create a curriculum for every student in every school that teaches them how to cook and shop smart! Use the schools on evenings and weekends to teach parents how to make healthier choices for their families. Make sure our young people have opportunities to get outside and play safely every day!

The sad fact is that you could drop an individual into a food oasis, and without the knowledge of what is good to eat and how to prepare it, that individual could starve to death! Only knowledge can solve that problem!

I close with a loud NO to the proposed ban. It is an overly simplistic, unconscionably intrusive measure that fails to really address this problem.

Sincerely,

O'Dell R.S.Farley

Testimony for Department of Health Public Hearing
On Bloomberg's Large Soda Ban Proposal 7/24

As a dietitian, I work with many patients in New York City seeking to manage their weight. While I admire the City's commitment to public health, I am concerned about the effectiveness of the proposed ban on beverages over 16 ounces.

Every day I work with people who are struggling to lose weight. I've come to learn that there isn't one food or drink "pouring on the pounds." Rather, it's a lack of knowledge or disregard about the role of calorie intake and physical activity in weight management. People who have learned to balance their calorie intake and incorporate regular physical activity are the ones who have lost, and successfully kept off excess weight over time.

By placing an undue focus on sugary drinks, the unintended message we send is that the rest of the diet doesn't matter. If implemented, this policy would be a disservice to New Yorkers, because it suggests that a healthy diet comes from eliminating certain foods, when in fact, they must consider the whole diet and learn the importance of moderation.

As health professionals, we know there are better strategies to effectively address the problem. We need to establish public health policies that provide the necessary education and resources to help people understand what calories mean and how many are right for them. A selective soda restriction doesn't do that. The bottom line is that placing a ban on drinks over 16 ounces will not encourage New Yorkers to exercise more or eat a healthier diet. Ultimately, this ban will not result in the long-lasting health changes that our City needs, and I urge you to consider approaches that will.

Thank you for your commitment to public health and taking the time to consider my comments.

Dear New York City Board of Health,

I OPPOSE Mayor Bloomberg's efforts to ban sodas, whatever size.

The size of regular sodas is NOT the CAUSE of OBESITY!!
Chemicals in our soil; household products; not resting farmland as in prior decades; xenoestrogens; the over use of corn, high fructose, etc.; side effects of medications are the REAL causes of obesity.

STOP Bloomberg from trying to control our lives!!

OPPOSE Bloomberg's war on "sodas". High Fructose is in many products including Snapple; fruit juices; etc!

Sincerely,
Robyne Huber

Sincerely,

R Huber

Comment: United Way of New York City is dedicated to improving Health, Education and Income for the most vulnerable New Yorkers. We support Mayor Bloombergs proposal to ban the sale of large-size sugary beverages from restaurants, mobile food carts, movie theaters and delis as it is a powerful step forward in combating unhealthy weight and helping New Yorkers live healthier. With 58% of New York City adults and 40% of our citys public school students obese or overweight, strong steps must be taken to curb New York Citys obesity problem. Helping people manage their sugary drink intake can help reduce the increased risk of diet-related diseases such as obesity and diabetes that comes with drinking such beverages.

United Way of New York Citys food programs similarly require soup kitchens and food pantries to limit beverages to skim milk and 100% fruit juices. We join the Mayor in his continued efforts to encourage New Yorkers to make better food choices. Measures like these, coupled with nutrition education and greater access to locally grown fruits and vegetables, are key to reducing diabetes, hypertension, and other diet-related diseases that plague far too many in our city.

OF NEW YORK INC

Comment of

Jennifer March-Joly
Executive Director
Citizens' Committee for Children

Comment Regarding Proposed Amendment of Article 81 of the New York City Health Code

July 24, 2012

My name is Jennifer March-Joly and I am the Executive Director of Citizens' Committee for Children of New York (CCC). CCC is a 68-year-old independent, multi-issue child advocacy organization dedicated to ensuring that every New York child is healthy, housed, educated and safe.

CCC strongly supports the proposed amendment to Article 81, which would establish a maximum size of 16-fluid ounces for sugary drinks sold in "Food Service Establishments," such as restaurants, mobile food carts, delis, and concession stands at movie theaters, stadiums, and arenas. As the proposal recognizes, these drinks contain no nutritional value, yet add unnecessary sugar and calories to New Yorkers' diets, and have thus played a role in New York City's current obesity epidemic. In light of these facts, the proposed amendment aims to reduce the consumption of sugary drinks, and ultimately decrease New York City's obesity rates. The many New Yorkers who are at risk of developing obesity-related health conditions stand to benefit from the adoption of this amendment.

The proposed amendment is of critical importance to New York City's school children, an alarming number of whom are obese or overweight. The City's Department of Health and Mental Hygiene (DOHMH) Fitnessgram data show that a large percentage of New York City public school students in grades kindergarten through eight can be categorized as "obese" or "overweight." Specifically, during the 2010-2011 school year, 18.1 percent of these students were "overweight" and 20.7 percent were considered "obese," including almost 6 percent of whom were "extremely obese."[1] For certain children the data is even bleaker, as these rates are elevated for children who live in high-poverty neighborhoods. For example, in neighborhoods where over 40 percent of the population lived below the federal poverty level, 24.1 percent of New York City public school students in kindergarten through eighth grades were considered "obese," including 7.1 percent of whom were "extremely obese."

High obesity rates are not confined solely to New York City's younger students, but can be found among public high school students as well. According to the Center for Disease Control and Prevention's Youth Risk Behavior Survey, in 2011, 15.5 percent of all New York City public school students in grades 9 through 12 were considered "overweight," and 11.6 percent were "obese," with higher obesity rates existing in certain boroughs, such as the Bronx (14.8 percent) and Brooklyn (12.8 percent). In addition, when surveyed, many of these teenagers revealed that they drank sugary beverages daily: 20.9 percent said that during the previous week they drank a can, bottle, or glass of soda one or more times each day, and 14.8 percent said they had done so two or more times per day.

As noted in the "Statement of Basis and Purpose" accompanying the proposed amendment, the potential negative outcomes resulting from childhood obesity are well-documented and troubling. Beyond immediate negative short-term impacts, which include increased school

[1] In this context, children are classified as "overweight" if they have a BMI of more than or equal to 25, or have a BMI less than the 95th percentile, but more than or equal to that of the 85th percentile. They are "obese" if they have a BMI of more than or equal to 30, or have a BMI equal to or greater than that of the 95th percentile. They are "extremely obese" if they have a BMI greater than or equal to 35, or have a BMI that is 120 percent of that of a child in the 95th percentile.

absences and poorer overall health, obesity also increases children's risks of developing chronic and life-threatening diseases that can impact life expectancy, such as diabetes and cardiovascular disease. Given the magnitude of the obesity epidemic, it is incumbent upon New York City to establish policies that will help children and their families combat obesity's devastating effects. The proposed amendment represents one such policy, as it teaches all children important lessons about portion control, and will ultimately help reduce over-consumption of the sugary beverages that contribute to obesity rates. We therefore support the proposed amendment.

Thank you for this opportunity to comment.

Quote from Geoff Canada of Harlem Children's Zone

"Obesity among children negatively impacts their quality of life, their health, and, in fact, can shorten their lives. The repercussions in poor neighborhoods are particularly troubling. Lacking the money and information to make healthier choices, poor families are consuming empty calories, particularly cheap, large containers of highly sweetened drinks. Buying these huge drinks is not the smart choice, so Mayor Bloomberg is absolutely right to protect our kids and families from the effects of these unnecessary and harmful beverage options."

VETO the Mayor's Beverage Proposal

cynthia rutherford [cyn07@vt.edu]

To: Resolution Comments

Dear New York City Board of Health,

Mandating and regulating personal choices did NOT work during prohibition and it will not work in New York City's sugary drink restrictions. Provide education, provide alternatives - but do not regulate the size of choice. If you are going to regulate sugary drinks than you also need to look at regulating everything that has negative health implications, such as all fast foods, all junk food, all desserts, all canned products, smoked meats, deli meats, and the list can encompass almost any food product consumers can purchase.

Bloomburg's proposal is NOT the answer any more than abstinence has worked in preventing teenage unplanned pregnancy campaign in Texas, which has one of the highest rates in the US. However, those states that implemented a robust education and birth control access has much lower rates. Education and options, not regulation and control, as the majority of adults do not respond positively to lifestyle mandates.

Reconsider your proposal and set the appropriate example through education and not by legislation and strong arm tactics.

Thank you,
CA Rutherford

MODIFY the Mayor's Sensible Beverage Proposal

Meredith Spitalnik [merryj@gmail.com]

Sent: Monday, July 23, 2012 5:35 PM
To: Resolution Comments

Dear New York City Board of Health,

I think a government mandate of maximum beverage sizes is frankly absurd. HOWEVER: Reading a comment just now in last week's Economist gave me an idea. Something does need to be done, but the government is not supposed to be our mother. The government's job is to provide basic civic services (roads&bridges, fire, police, education, etc), judiciary services for mediation, and standards for fair trade.

Under the latter aegis, it makes sense to standardize what you get in a "small", "medium", or "large" beverage. If the "standard" size for a serving of soda is 8oz, then it would make sense for a "small" to be 4-6oz, a "medium" to be 8oz, a "large" 12-16oz, and then perhaps some "extra-large", "super","jumbo", "ridiculous", "pitcher", "massive", "bucket" and "coma-inducing". That will achieve the same effect without being "mom" about it, or, which worries me more, increasing the impact of all those double cups on our landfills, which the Mayor's current proposal will do.

--- The remainder of the form letter follows - it's good. -----

Norms for sugary drink sizes are alarmingly high, as 32 and 64 ounce sodas are commonplace across the city. Even the proposed limit of 16 ounces is still double a standard 8-ounce serving. Mayor Bloomberg's plan is backed by extensive scientific research that shows growing portion sizes for sugary drinks are among the driving forces of the ongoing obesity epidemic. The Institute of Medicine recently recommended that government leaders adopt policies and implement practices to reduce over-consumption of sugary drinks, which are a top source of calories in Americans' diets.

Right now, about one-third of children and two-thirds of adults are overweight or obese. Obesity is an epidemic, and it contributes to growing rates of type 2 diabetes, heart disease, hypertension and even some cancers. If we do not reverse childhood obesity in particular, this generation of kids could be the first in America's history to live sicker and die younger than their parents' generation.

Bold action from leaders like you is needed to reverse the obesity epidemic, and we can't wait!

New York is one of the greatest cities in the world, and you have the opportunity to make it even greater, by continuing to lead the nation in using policy to improve nutrition and prevent obesity. Please approve Mayor Bloomberg's proposal and serve up a healthy change for our great city.

Sincerely,

Meredith Spitalnik

New York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene
Board of Health
Office of the Secretary to the Board
2 Gotham Center, 14th Floor, Room 14-15, Box 31

To Whom It May Concern,

I am writing to express my support for the Department of Health and Mental Hygiene's proposal that the Board of Health amend Article 81 of the Health Code, related to the maximum size of sugary drinks and self-service beverage cups sold and offered in food service establishments.

New York City's bold proposal to ban the sale of large sodas and other sugary drinks is a major step in the right direction. As a nation, we need to recognize that obesity is a largely acquired condition—not unlike HIV and lung cancer —and one that underlies or exacerbates most chronic disease today, including diabetes, heart disease, and some cancers. On an individual level, these conditions impair quality of life and shorten lifespan. On a population level, they result in many avoidable hospitalizations, re-admissions and, ultimately, trillions of dollars in health care spending. As such, the Department of Health and Mental Hygiene has my full support in this and all measures aimed at primary prevention of obesity and chronic disease.

As an academic medical center at the crossroads of East Harlem, Mount Sinai is keenly aware of the obesity epidemic and its consequences. In fact, The Mount Sinai Medical Center is the largest site recognized by the American Diabetes Association as a Center of Excellence for Education and Diabetes Self-Management. One third of East Harlem adults (31%) is overweight and another third (31%) is obese, which is the highest proportion of obese adults among all neighborhoods in New York City. Obesity contributes to a number of other serious health problems, including heart disease and diabetes. In addition, twenty percent of the patients hospitalized at Mount Sinai are diabetic, more than double the national percentage.

Written comment on the proposed amendment to Article 81 - Food Preparation and Food Service Establishments (the "sugary drink portion size" proposal):

The crisis levels that obesity has reached are horrifying enough on their own. Still more alarming is the fact that in low-income and minority communities, the very communities that Restoration serves, these problems are even more rampant. For this reason, Restoration applauds Mayor Bloomberg's anti-obesity initiative and the move to reduce the consumption of sugary beverages.

Bedford Stuyvesant's health indicators underscore the need for initiatives like these: 41% of the neighborhood's youth are obese, compared to NYC's 23.4% average, and the related diabetes rates are similarly more pronounced in the area. It is no coincidence that soda consumption is also through the roof, with 38% of teens in Bedford Stuyvesant drinking soda daily, not to mention other sugar-sweetened beverages. As a community development corporation, Restoration's goal is to improve the quality of life in the Central Brooklyn communities we serve and, in so doing, to improve neighborhood outcomes as a whole. But this goal can only be realized through the implementation of systematic and environmental changes. Decreasing access to sugar's empty calories through policy change will help break this web of unhealthy lifestyle decisions, as well as facilitate the making of healthier choices. Moreover, Mayor Bloomberg's proposal will go miles in helping increase public awareness of obesity, of portion control, and ultimately, of healthier lifestyles.

ERIC SCHLOSSER, AUTHOR, FAST FOOD NATION

"Once again, Mayor Bloomberg is leading the fight against private interests that make their money by endangering the public health. Soda isn't food. It has no nutritional value. And soda consumption has been strongly linked to obesity and diabetes. New York City has every right to reduce the harm and the health care costs being imposed by irresponsible corporate behavior. The mayor's proposal won't prevent anyone from buying sugary drinks. But it will encourage people to consume less of them---and fast food chains to earn their profits by selling something else."

Dear New York City Board of Health,

I am writing in non-support of Mayor Michael Bloomberg's proposal to limit the size of soda and similar sugar-sweetened beverages sold in restaurants, movie theaters and food carts to 16 ounces.

While I applaud the mayor for his efforts in taking this a step to tackle obesity rates in New York City, I feel this is seriously crossing a boundary of a private citizen's decision-making ability.

Sure the obesity rate in this country is alarming; however, limiting one's choices is a step in a direction that I find equally, if not more, alarming.

Now, I understand that just because the law limits a portion size, there's nothing keeping the citizen him/herself from just buying an extra serving. But at what point do you make it the person's responsibility? Businesses can't possibly complain about this, because in the end, they'll make more of a profit on the deal. The smaller drinks tend to cost more per ounce than the larger ones, so bully for the company. But it doesn't make the individual actually make the better choice, and they have to pay more for it.

But the bottom line for me is that this is a step closer to coming into someone's home and telling them what to do. I would like to point out at this time that I don't even drink sodas and I rarely eat a sugary sweet. I'm in excellent health, being a marathon runner and distance cyclist. I eat right and exercise 5 - 6 times a week.

I am all for people getting healthy. I just don't think the government has a right to make this choice for them. Surely there's a better solution.

Dear New York City Board of Health,

Hello,
I am writing to say that I absolutely do not approve of the mayors proposal to limit the sale of sugary drinks. Yes, they might be harmful and unhealthy to certain individuals, but those individuals can be educated and then think for themselves. Many Americans are uneducated, and we should correct that at the very beginning. There is absolutely no justifiable reason that elementary school kids don't know what real vegetable looks like, where milk come from and that pizza is NOT a vegetable.
Also, by restricting people's right to buy whatever size soda they would like, the government is taking away rights away from the people. And is this restriction actually going to do any good? Are we actually going to believe that Americans who want a huge soda are incapable of just buying two smaller ones instead?

Dear New York City Board of Health,

I am writing in DISPOSE of Mayor Michael Bloomberg's Insatiable proposal to limit the size of soda and similar sugar-sweetened beverages sold in restaurants, movie theaters and food carts to 16 ounces. I say the mayor is taking the wrong a step to tackle obesity in New York City, and I urge you to "disapprove the proposal".

Not everyone empties a 64oz drink alone. It's cheaper to purchase one X-Lg anything for a large family to share, than to buy 4-9 individual items. Don't follow McDonalds roll in making take out/fast food purchases harder for families, which will cause decline in purchases from these venues. An individuals obesity issue is their own. The stores, theaters & restaurants aren't responsible. Creating laws to put everyone on a diet is wrong & down right unconstitutional!

A persons weight is not a government issue when you cannot house the homeless, feed the hungry, keep drug dealers from offering to kids, graduate more students above a 3.0 GPA, find kids MIA, apply homeland security to needed areas & more. Keep your focus on higher priorities & let people make their own decisions (Ex: Roe vs Wade - abortion is choice, so is obesity)

Norms for sugary drink sizes are alarmingly high, as 32 and 64 ounce sodas are commonplace across the city. So, Mayor Bloomberg's should make it mandatory to post "Sugars, Calories, Cholesterol, etc" backed by extensive scientific research. Government leaders should NOT adopt/enforce these policies but reduce over-governing the people of Americans' & stop trying to place us all on diets (offer choice to be on a diet [low salt, less sugar, etc] but don't mandate.

Obesity is an epidemic and a choice, so have counseling available for those who seek it. Market the growing rates of type 2 diabetes, heart disease, hypertension and even some cancers. Telling them if they do not reverse childhood obesity, they may grow into sicker adults.

Do NOT allow this policy to become a law, taking away our freedom of CHOICE!

New York is one of the greatest cities in the world, and creating this law could effect this whole country & others. Lead the nation in Disapproving Mayor Bloomberg's proposal and serve up a healthy amount of choice. This my choice to Voice to eat more or buy xlarge's to feed a whole family that doesn't live in the economy of wealth.

INTRODUCTION AND SUMMARY

The American Beverage Association ("ABA") respectfully submits these comments on behalf of its members, including companies that bottle, distribute, and sell non-alcoholic beverages in New York City. ABA opposes the New York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene's ("DOH") proposal to amend Article 81 of the New York City Health Code to restrict the size of sugar-sweetened beverages ("SSBs") and self-service beverage cups sold and offered in certain Food Service Establishments ("FSEs"). The proposed rule is arbitrary and capricious, not supported by credible scientific evidence, and would be unlawful if adopted. It should be withdrawn.

The proposed rule will have no beneficial impact on obesity. It rests on the false premise that SSBs are a significant driver of obesity rates—a misguided notion that the scientific data and literature refute. DOH has ignored numerous independent studies that have shown that obesity rates are not driven by SSB consumption. Data from the latest National Health and Nutrition Examination Survey ("NHANES") document that nearly two out of every three obese persons report drinking no sugar-sweetened soft drinks. Intake of calories and added sugar from SSBs has declined steadily over the last 12 years and now constitute only about 6-7 percent of calories consumed, yet obesity rates continue to go up. The available scientific literature, considered as a whole, confirms that SSBs are not a driver of obesity. Because DOH's proposal nonetheless arbitrarily targets solely SSBs—a small and declining source of calories—and does nothing to address any other food or beverage item in the diet, it will have no beneficial impact in reducing obesity.

The DOH is supposed to make decisions "based on science."[1] It has failed to do so with the proposed rule. The draft rule ignores the published articles and other publicly available information that contradict its assertions. Worse still, DOH has ignored data in the very studies that it does cite that directly undermine DOH's asserted reasons for making its misguided SSB-only proposal. When the relevant scientific data and research are considered as a whole, it is clear that the science does not rationally support DOH's asserted link between SSBs and obesity.

Indeed, worse than doing no good, the proposed rule may well do harm. The underlying message of the proposed rule is that a singular focus on reducing SSB consumption is a scientifically supportable way to combat obesity. Nothing could be further from the truth, yet this government-endorsed approach could mislead consumers and misinform their health choices by encouraging greater consumption of high-calorie foods and beverages not covered by the proposed rule (the "Snackwell effect"[2]) and actually prove counter-productive to public health.

The ineffectiveness of DOH's proposal is exacerbated by its irrational and arbitrary exclusions, loopholes, and classifications. There is no scientific justification for excluding beer and other alcoholic beverages, or for excluding countless other food and beverage items that are served in large portions and have far more calories than SSBs, yet are not covered under the rule. DOH has presented no health rationale for settling on 25 calories per 8 ounces for beverages that fall under its rule, or 50% milk content to exclude beverages, evidencing that DOH's line-drawing is the product of political considerations not science. It is equally arbitrary to apply the proposed size limitation only to certain FSEs, yet to permit grocery stores, convenience stores, gas stations, and other establishments to continue selling these same items—likely at higher prices. Even for the covered FSEs, allowing unlimited free refills and multiple beverage purchases will ensure that there is no meaningful impact on consumption. Indeed, because the self-service beverage cup size limitation applies to diet and zero-calorie beverages, even the cost of those beverages will increase, causing access to no-calorie beverages to decline and standing the proposed rule on its head. Such simultaneous over-inclusiveness and under-inclusiveness will ensure that, while having no beneficial effect on obesity, the proposed rule will impose needless burdens on consumers and businesses.

DOH's proposed rule also is plainly unlawful on numerous grounds. Neither DOH nor the Board of Health has the authority to decree under the guise of food-safety regulation what is in reality pure policy legislation rife with important economic, social, and political choices. Established principles of separation of powers forbid this action and render ultra vires these sorts of attempts by executive agencies to exceed their appropriately cabined gap-filling role. Adopting the proposed rule would be a naked exercise of policy-making authority that neither DOH nor the Board possesses.

In addition, the palpably arbitrary classifications and distinctions drawn by the proposed rule would violate the Equal Protection Clauses of the United States and New York Constitutions, and render it unlawfully arbitrary and capricious under New York administrative law. The proposed rule would also run afoul of the Dormant Commerce Clause, as it would impose massive, unjustifiable burdens on interstate businesses and commerce, and risk the creation of an unfathomably complex patchwork of different size limits for SSBs (and eventually other foods and beverages) among various states and cities across the country, effectively allowing national beverage container standards to be dictated by the most restrictive local regulation. Moreover, the vagueness of the proposed rule's convoluted and incongruous limitations and restrictions, coupled with its unprecedented infringement on individual liberty and property interests, would violate the Due Process Clauses of the New York and United States Constitutions.

Not surprisingly, the proposed rule has sparked widespread negative responses. The New York Times was quick to condemn it as an instance of clear executive "overreach[]."[3] National Public Radio and The Economist have challenged the arbitrary exclusion of expensive, high-calorie coffee drinks and wines and other alcohols, obviously for political reasons and not for any scientific purpose. One of the experts cited by DOH purportedly in support of its proposal, Dr. Brian Wansink of Cornell University, was quick to protest DOH's misuse of his data, and unequivocal in his prediction that the proposed rule "will be an epic failure," causing him to expressly "warn[] against" adopting it.[4] Other examples of similarly negative reactions to the proposed rule, from a wide range of sources, have been compiled in Appendix D to these comments.

The goal of combatting obesity is of great importance, but meaningful results cannot be achieved by imposing arbitrary measures supported only by one-sided and misleading views of the scientific evidence. Serious solutions require engagement by the responsible political branches in tackling all major facets of the problem, in a manner that invites the participation of the principal stakeholders, including the consumers whose individual, private decision-making DOH proposes to displace. DOH lacks the legal authority and policy expertise to tackle the multi-faceted aspects of this social problem. The proposed rule represents a token political effort and a profoundly flawed approach that, if approved, will not reduce obesity. Indeed, it risks making the problem worse. ABA opposes DOH's proposed rule because it is misguided, unscientific, arbitrary, and, ultimately, would be unlawful.

Part I of these comments introduces ABA and its members and describes product stewardship initiatives they have undertaken to ensure that consumers have the education and information they need to make informed choices about the beverages they consume. Part II demonstrates that the proposed rule is scientifically misguided, will have no positive impact on obesity, and will risk making the problem worse. Part III explains the legal flaws of the proposed rule and demonstrates why it would be unlawful if it were adopted. These comments are supported and supplemented by the attached expert reports of Drs. Marilyn D. Schorin, Victor Fulgoni, III, and Howard Ory.

I. BACKGROUND ON THE AMERICAN BEVERAGE ASSOCIATION

The ABA is the national trade organization representing the broad spectrum of companies that make up America's non-alcoholic beverage industry, including beverage producers, distributors, franchise companies, and support industries. ABA's members bring to market hundreds of different brands, flavors, and products, including soft drinks, diet soft drinks, bottled water (including still water, mineral water, and artesian water), sports drinks, energy drinks, 100% juices, juice drinks, and ready-to-drink teas. ABA members meet the demands and diverse preferences of Americans by making a broad range of beverage options available to consumers—including a multitude of zero-calorie and low-calorie beverages in an assortment of sizes—and clearly labeling those beverages with nutritional and caloric information, all in an effort to empower individual consumers to make the choices that best suit their needs and preferences.

ABA members' commitment to helping consumers make informed choices in selecting their beverages is illustrated by the Clear on Calories initiative launched in February 2010 in support of the First Lady's "Let's Move!" anti-obesity campaign. Through that initiative, the leading ABA member companies pledged to display total calorie information in a clear and consumer-friendly manner on the front of all beverage products, as well as company-controlled vending machines and fountain equipment, to educate and inform consumers on calories in their beverages prior to the point of purchase. To meet the objectives of this initiative, the beverage companies agreed to use a uniform calorie label, consistent in both design and placement across their various product offerings, and conducted multiple rounds of consumer research so as best to ensure that consumers have easy access to the information they need to make informed choices. Today, ABA's signature "Clear on Calories" program can be seen on thousands of products on store shelves across the country, placing calorie information at consumers' fingertips.

Recognizing that schools represent a unique environment where parents are not present to supervise what their children eat and drink, the ABA and a number of its member companies have worked collaboratively with the Alliance for a Healthier Generation to create the Alliance School Beverage Guidelines. The beverage industry voluntarily agreed to alter the mix of beverages in schools across the country, removing full-calorie soft drinks from schools and replacing them with lower-calorie options and smaller portion sizes. Under the Guidelines, only 100%juice, low- or non-fat milk, and plain bottled water are sold in elementary and middle schools, with the addition of lower-calorie beverages like 12-ounce sports drinks in high schools.[5] ABA member companies also do not market beverages other than fruit juice, milk, and water in advertising intended for children under the age of 12.

The ABA and its members support these efforts to educate consumers about nutrition and health, support providing consumers with product-specific information, and support allowing consumers to make their own decisions about the foods and beverages they wish to enjoy. But for the reasons described in the next sections of these comments, ABA and its members do not support the misguided, unscientific, heavy-handed, and unproductive restraints on consumer choice proposed here by DOH.

II. THE PROPOSED RULE WILL NOT REDUCE OBESITY

DOH's proposed rule is based on the fundamentally flawed and unsupported premise that sugar-sweetened beverages are a driver of obesity. As shown by the comments below and the attached expert reports of Drs. Marilyn D. Schorin, Victor Fulgoni, III and Howard Ory, obesity is a multifaceted problem resulting from an individual's energy imbalance—i.e., when calories consumed exceed calories expended. No single food or beverage causes obesity. A substantial body of literature provides convincing evidence that SSBs in particular are not a driver of obesity rates. Over the last 40 years, while obesity rates have climbed dramatically, the vast majority of increased calories in a typical diet have come from added fats and oils, flour and cereal, and dairy, not from caloric sweeteners. DOH has ignored entirely the data and literature pertaining to other foods and beverages that are served in large portions and comprise a much larger portion of a typical diet. By focusing solely on SSBs without scientific justification, DOH's proposal, if adopted, would fail completely to have any beneficial impact on obesity rates. Moreover, the irrational exclusions embedded in the proposed rule will ensure that it has no meaningful impact on consumption of SSBs, and the rule might actually do harm by encouraging individuals to disregard caloric intake from other foods and beverages.

A. Consumption of SSBs Is Not A Driver Of Obesity Rates

SSBs comprise a small percentage of the typical daily diet. The 2010 Dietary Guidelines Advisory Committee report to the Secretary of Health and Human Services confirms that SSBs comprise only 5.2% of calories consumed (between 6% and 7% including sweetened juices)—meaning that 93-95% of calories consumed are from other foods and beverages, and are wholly unaddressed by DOH's proposal.[6] Since the United States government started tracking added sugar intake in 1999/2000, sugar intake and calories from SSBs have steadily decreased, while obesity rates have continued to rise (Figure 1).[7]

The most recent NHANES data (2009-2010), released just weeks ago, show that obesity continues to rise,[8] and SSB consumption continues to decline among all groups (Figure 2), and sweetened soda consumption has declined even more dramatically (Figure 3).[9] Caloric intake from SSBs declined by more than 20% between 2001 and 2010, with a reduction of more than 35% in calories from sweetened soda during that time.[10] Figures 4 and 5 show statistically significant downward trends in sweetened soda and SSB consumption over the last five NHANES reporting cycles.[11] Further, the latest NHANES data show that on any given day:

- Approximately two out of three (66%) obese subjects report drinking no sugar-sweetened soda at all (Figure 4);[12]
- Approximately one half of obese people drink no SSBs (Figure 5);[13]
- Only about 15% of obese people drink more than 16 ounces of sweetened soda (Figure 6);[14]
- Only about 23.5% of obese subjects report consuming more than 16 ounces of SSBs, meaning that three out of four obese subjects drink no or less than 16 ounces of SSBs (Figure 7);[15]
- And for all subjects—including normal-weight subjects—these numbers are similar.[16]
- To be sure, DOH survey data reveal that even among New York City youth, sweetened soda and SSB consumption patterns are similar across normal-weight, overweight, and obese subjects (Figure 8).[17]

These data, supported by peer-reviewed studies as described below, demonstrate that consumption of SSBs is not a driver of obesity rates.

B. Calories From Other Sources Are Growing And Are Far Greater Than Calories From SSBs

Americans in 2008 consumed approximately 617 more calories per day than they did in 1970. Of those 617 calories, 560 of them—nearly 91%—are not from caloric sweeteners, but instead come primarily from increased consumption of added fats and oil (213 calories), flour and cereal (193 calories), and dairy (107 calories). Caloric sweeteners (of which SSBs are a small segment) make up less than 10% of the additional calories consumed in 2008.[25] Data from the National Heart, Lung, and Blood Institute show that, over the last 20 years, the portion sizes

Numerous foods and beverages excluded from the proposed rule that are consumed regularly by New Yorkers have a much higher caloric content than SSBs on a per serving or per ounce basis (Figures 5 and 6),[29] and have become an even larger part of the diet.[30]

C. The Published Scientific Literature, As A Whole, Confirms That SSBs Are Not A Driver Of Obesity And That Only Comprehensive Energy Balance Will Help Address The Obesity Problem

A substantial body of literature shows that there is no compelling evidence that consumption of SSBs is a driver of obesity rates, such that singling out SSBs—or any single dietary item—is not an effective way to address obesity. Key studies are described in the expert reports of Drs. Ory and Schorin. In the following paragraphs, we provide highlights of several studies.

The World Cancer Research Fund (WCRF) sponsored a comprehensive review of the epidemiological literature that examined possible associations between various food groups, physical activity, and obesity. The study concluded that consumption of beverages of any type is not associated with excess weight gain or obesity.[33]

Another group, led by Dr. Richard Mattes of Purdue University and David Allison of the University of Alabama, conducted a thorough, systematic review and meta-analysis of randomized controlled experiments to understand any relationship between SSB consumption and body weight. This group also concluded that the available scientific evidence does not permit the conclusion that SSBs cause obesity or that reducing SSB consumption would decrease BMI.[34]

A UCLA study examined any association between SSBs and obesity by looking at survey data from 47,000 Californians. It revealed that, while 51% of Californians are overweight or obese, 75.5% of those individuals drink no SSBs or less than one per day. Further, 52% of adults who drank no SSBs at all were either overweight or obese.[35]

An expansive study led by Dr. Ian Janssen and funded by Health Canada and the Canadian Population Health Initiative examined overweight prevalence among 137,593 youth in 34 countries and found no relationship between being overweight and consuming SSBs. This study did find that lower physical activity levels and greater television viewing were associated with being overweight and concluded that "[i]ncreasing physical activity participation and decreasing television viewing should be the focus of strategies aimed at preventing and treating overweight and obesity in youth."[36]

Another robust study of 13,824 boys and girls ages 2 to 18 conducted by a team from the College of Pharmacy and Nutrition at the University of Saskatchewan found no association between SSB intake and obesity for four out of five age and gender groups; while the study found an association for one group (among 6-11 year old boys), it did not find any causation between SSB intake and obesity, and it did not rule out that other factors could be responsible for weight gain.[37] With no evidence even of an association in four of five groups, this large Canadian study clearly does not show that consumption of SSBs is a driver of obesity.

A study by Dr. Matthias B. Schulze—and relied on by DOH in its proposed rule—found during a 4-year period that the portion of the study population that gained weight while consistently consuming one serving or less per week of SSBs was 38,737 women, whereas the portion of the study population that gained the same amount of weight while consistently consuming one serving or more per day was just 2,366 women. In other words, there were 16 times as many women who gained weight while *in*frequently consuming SSBs as there were women who gained weight while frequently consuming SSBs, and these two groups gained the same amount of weight.[38] The Schulze study found little difference in mean BMI levels in populations with high and low consumptions. Women who consistently consumed less than one SSB per week had an average BMI of 24.3, whereas those who consistently consumed more than one per day had a virtually identical BMI of 24.4.[39] Similar results have been reported in other studies.[40] Indeed, studies have also found that the consumption of added sugars generally is not associated with levels of overweight or obesity.[41]

In a study funded by the International Life Sciences Institute that examined intake of added sugars and obesity using NHANES data, the investigators classified the study population into eight groups based on percentage of energy received from added sugars, starting with a group that received less than 5% of energy intake from added sugars (<5%), and working up in 5% increments to those whose energy intake from added sugars exceeded 35% of total energy intake. The investigators found that 88.8% of obese individuals derived less than 25% of their energy intake from added sugars (the level recommended by Institute of Medicine), and only 11.2% were above the 25% recommendation.[42] The pattern was essentially the same for normal-weight persons. The prevalence of obesity decreased as the percentage of energy from added sugar went up, thus clearly contradicting any notion that consumption of added sugars is a driver of obesity rates.[43]

The fundamental problem with DOH's flawed approach also is illustrated by a milk consumption study that found, contrary to the authors' hypotheses, that children who drank the most milk, including skim milk, gained more weight than children who drank less milk.[44] "Our analysis of a very large prospective cohort of children from all 50 states, who provided annual data from 1996 to 1999, suggests that high intakes of milk, including skim and 1% milk, may provide some children with excess energy that results in an increase in body weight."[45] The study involved 12,829 children aged 9-14 followed for four years. "Skim and 1% milk appeared more strongly linked (per serving) to weight gain than whole or 2% milk."[46] Estimated 3-year effects were more than three times the magnitude of 1-year effects, which "suggests that these effects accumulate over time."[47] The authors found that boys and girls who drank more than three servings per day of milk were 35% and 36% more likely to become overweight during year 1 than boys or girls who drank more than one but less than or equal to two servings.[48]

The takeaway from the milk study is not that DOH should restrict the amount of milk people consume in order to combat obesity.[49] Rather, it reinforces the core notion that obesity does not turn upon the source of calories, whether they come from consumption of milk, muffins, bagels, cookies, cheesecake, pizza, or soda. This is confirmed by several studies that compared equal caloric consumption of SSBs and other solid foods and found either no difference or a suggestion that consumption of solid foods has a more profound effect on weight change.[50]

Nor is it scientifically justified to target SSBs because DOH has deemed them "empty calories." One could make the same claim about wine, beer, martinis, margaritas, doughnuts, pork rinds, saltwater taffy, coffee and tea sweetened with sugar or honey, and a variety of other foods and beverages that people enjoy as part of a healthy diet and that DOH excludes from its proposed ordinance and never addresses in its Statement of Basis and Purpose. One person's empty calories are another person's source of enjoyment, and many of the SSBs included under the proposed rule include nutrients that are important to a balanced diet, including juice drinks, sodas, and water fortified with vitamins and minerals. Everyone should of course strive to consume a balanced diet that contains all of the essential nutrients. But after that, the focus should be on excess calories, not arbitrary classifications of what constitutes so-called empty calories. To focus on SSBs alone, and ignore other foods and beverages that are served in large portions and are a much greater source of calories, reflects a regulation of preference untethered from science. Worse still, it could mislead consumers into making ill-informed decisions in their efforts to maintain a healthy diet.

To reduce obesity, achieving an individualized energy balance—addressing both caloric expenditure and consumption—is necessary.[51] No single element of a diet, nor any single diet for that matter, provides a solution to weight gain. Data collected by the National Weight Control Registry establish that no distinct diet is predictive of success in losing weight; rather, the critical factor is reducing calories consumed overall.[52] Researchers at various institutions reached the same conclusion in a clinical trial assessing which type of diet works best to promote weight loss. They found that every diet can reduce body weight as long as calories are reduced, regardless of which macronutrients the diet emphasized.[53]

The available literature and scientific data, described more fully in the expert reports of Drs. Ory and Schorin, show that SSBs are not the driving force behind increased weight gain or obesity. DOH's core premise—that consumption of SSBs is a unique driver of obesity rates—is wrong.

D. DOH's Presentation Of Scientific Information Is Incomplete And Misleading

DOH, in its presentation of the proposed rule, has ignored virtually all of the scientific information presented in the preceding sections of these comments. This information is available in the published literature and other publicly available databases, and thus there is no justification for disregarding it. DOH's selective and uneven use of data is a powerful indicator of bias (and a classic measure of arbitrary and capricious agency action). DOH's presentation of data also is misleading in several critical respects.

DOH's starting assertion that "Americans consume 200-300 more calories than 30 years ago, with the largest increase due to sugary drinks"[54] is simply wrong. As shown above, the increase in caloric intake is considerably larger, and more than 90% is attributable to foods and beverages outside of the added sugar category (of which SSBs are only a fraction).[55]

DOH cites several studies for the proposition that portion sizes of SSBs have increased over time, but these studies also show that portion sizes of other foods and beverages have increased, in most cases by larger amounts compared to SSBs.[56] Even The Joy of Cooking has adjusted its portion sizes.[57] DOH ignores this information. Rather than supporting DOH's single-minded approach, the studies DOH cites demonstrate that focusing on SSBs alone will fail to have an impact on obesity rates.

DOH's misplaced reliance on the Schulze study has already been described above. Another prime example of incomplete and misleading presentation of data can be seen in DOH's reliance on the Ludwig study.[58] DOH cites this study for the proposition that "[w]ith every additional sugary beverage a child drinks daily, his/her odds of becoming obese increase by 60%."[59] Although the paper has been cited many times over for this proposition, the statement is a misleading extrapolation of a much narrower finding. The study reports that the "odds ratio of becoming obese among children increased 1.6 times for each additional can or glass of sugar sweetened drink they consumed every day." What is not often cited is that the increased consumption was far less than one additional serving; in fact, it was only 0.22 servings per day,[60] and the associated probability of being obese based on that increase is just 12%. And that small difference was based on data from only 37 study subjects who became obese during the study, which, as the authors concede, gave the study "limited statistical power."

Those who cite the Ludwig study also seldom report the fact that although 37 subjects became obese, 35 subjects moved from obese to non-obese; there were 150 obese children at the beginning of the study period, and 152 obese children at the end, hardly compelling evidence for an effect of SSBs. Similarly, the authors reported that a one-beverage-per-day increase in consumption leads to a 0.24 point increase in BMI, but again the actual increase in beverage consumption was just 0.22 servings per day, which translates to only a 0.05 point increase in BMI from SSBs. And the overall increase in BMI for the 37 study subjects who became obese during the study was 1.5 points, which means that 96 percent of the observed BMI increase (at least) was attributable to something other than SSB consumption. As has been noted in a published critique of the study, "[t]he vast bulk of the weight gain in the period was entirely unrelated to beverage consumption."[61] DOH, however, relies upon the popular sound-bite from the study, and ignores this information entirely, just as it ignores other studies that present opposite findings.

Other studies cited by DOH also do not provide credible support for the proposed rule, including the review by Malik et al. (2006).[62] That paper purports to review a large body of scientific information, but most of the studies cited by Malik et al. predate the evidence showing obesity rates continuing to rise over the last dozen years while consumption of SSBs has declined. Moreover, Malik et al., in several critical respects, present an incomplete summary of the studies as documented in the expert report prepared by Dr. Ory, attached to these comments.[63]

Still further, several of the studies cited by DOH recognize implicitly or explicitly that focusing only on one source of calories, as DOH proposes to do here, will not work. A compelling example is the paper by Mozaffarian et al. (2011).[64] This very large study (three separate cohorts totaling 120,877 subjects) found positive associations between weight gain and consumption of a wide range of foods and beverages, including: potato chips, potatoes, unprocessed red meats, processed meats, butter, sweets and desserts, refined grains, fruit juices, low fat or skim milk, and alcohol. Associations also were noted for physical activity (negative association), sleep (more weight gain with less than 6 or more than 8 hours sleep) and television watching. DOH ignores these findings. More importantly, DOH ignores the interpretation of the data as a whole presented by the study authors:

> Whereas weight changes associated with any single lifestyle factor were relatively modest in our three cohorts, in the aggregate, changes in diet and physical activity accounted for large differences in weight gain.[65]

Thus, this paper also clearly does not support an approach that focuses on SSBs alone, but instead provides strong support for the proposition that a comprehensive approach is needed to address obesity in individuals and across populations. DOH's selective use of one isolated data point, and disregard for all of the other findings and evidence this study contains, is yet another strong indicator of a closed-minded and misleading use of data to support a scientifically-unjustified proposal.

DOH's assertion that consumption of SSBs has been linked to an increased risk of heart disease and diabetes also is based on an incomplete and misleading presentation of relevant data. DOH ignores contrary studies and overstates the significance of the findings in the studies that it does cite. A more complete analysis of the available scientific literature is presented in the expert report prepared by Dr. Ory. Considered fairly and as a whole, the available data do not demonstrate a causal link between SSB consumption and either health concern.[66] Obesity is a risk factor for these adverse health outcomes, but as has been shown above and in the expert report prepared by Dr. Ory, the available scientific literature does not demonstrate a causal link between SSB consumption and obesity.

DOH has not presented a credible scientific justification for its SSB-only proposed rule, which appears instead to rest upon economic, social, or political choices that are not DOH's to make. Moreover, DOH's presentation of scientific information is incomplete and misleading, and bears many of the classic markers of biased, arbitrary, and capricious agency action. Many of the studies cited by DOH in fact provide compelling evidence that DOH's unscientific proposal will fail entirely to have any beneficial impact on obesity rates.

E. DOH's Proposed Rule Will Have No Impact On Obesity Or Caloric Consumption, And Could Make The Obesity Problem Worse

The data and studies discussed above and the analyses in the attached reports of Drs. Shorin, Fulgoni, and Ory show that DOH's proposed rule would not reduce obesity. The problems with the proposed rule are exacerbated by its scientifically irrational exclusions, loopholes, and classifications, which would ensure that there is no meaningful decrease in caloric consumption while imposing tremendous burdens on consumers and businesses. And the unintended consequences of targeting SSBs—including dietary substitution, the "Snackwell effect,"[67] and a false sense of solution—could lead to even greater caloric consumption among New Yorkers and make the obesity problem worse.

[66] Ory Report at 9. To the extent some studies do purport to find an association (not a causal link) between SSB consumption and diabetes, several studies also purport to finding such an association between diabetes and consumption of numerous other categories of foods and beverages. Once again, DOH chooses to ignore these aspects of the studies. Id.

First, DOH has provided no reasonable, scientific justification for its decision to exclude from its proposed rule beer and other alcoholic beverages. Nor has it presented any scientific justification connected to the stated purpose of the proposed rule—combatting obesity—for excluding numerous other high-calorie foods and beverages, including lattes, mochas, milkshakes, fancy juice smoothies, chocolate milk, pizza, muffins, and burgers that have been increasing dramatically in portions size and calories—in amounts far greater than SSBs, especially over the last 12 years, as calories from SSBs have declined. It is nonsensical that individuals will be forbidden from purchasing anything larger than a 16 ounce SSB, but will remain free to purchase beers, mixed drinks, sweetened lattes, protein-boost juice smoothies, and other food items in any size or portion. As noted above and in the attached reports of Dr. Schorin and Dr. Ory, such an approach will have no beneficial impact on obesity.

Second, DOH's rule would apply to some but not all FSEs, resulting in an arbitrary hodge-podge patchwork of establishments where SSB sizes are restricted and others—such as all convenience stores, grocery stores, and gas stations—where no size restrictions will apply. This jumbled and disjointed regulatory regime will not affect consumption rates at all; given the diversity of businesses on one city street, all New Yorkers will have to do is go to the business next door to purchase the beverage of their choice. Instead, all the proposed rule will do is place those establishments subject to the rule—including local push cart vendors and community bodegas—at a competitive disadvantage. If the locations where New Yorkers purchase the majority of their SSBs in sizes greater than 16 ounces remain free to sell SSBs in any size, DOH's proposal will likely do nothing more than distort the market and redirect beverage sales to businesses that would, under the proposed regime, have an incentive to tout their greater range of product offerings. It would make no sense that a consumer would be allowed to purchase an SSB in a container larger than 16 ounces at a convenience store, but not at the restaurant next door. Or that a family can bring a 2-liter bottle of soda to a city park to share on a picnic, but cannot purchase a large drink to share from the street cart vendor in the park or when attending a sporting event. Calories, whether from SSBs or other foods and beverages, obviously are the same wherever purchased and consumed. To be sure, whether calories from SSBs are consumed from a 16 ounce container or multiple 12 ounce containers, they are the same (except that the latter will come with additional cost and packaging).

Third, there is no scientific or logical reason why all self-serve fountain cups at FSEs must be limited to 16 ounces—even for those drinking diet or zero-calorie sodas or water. The claim that this is necessary to prevent circumvention of the proposed rule is undercut by the numerous incoherent loopholes DOH has sanctioned, including unlimited free refills, the allowable purchase of multiple SSBs, and no limits on the amount of sweetener an individual may add to his or her drink.

Fourth, DOH has presented no scientific justification for defining covered drinks as those with greater than 25 calories per 8 fluid ounces of beverage, or selecting 50% "milk or milk product" content as the point at which a beverage is no longer subject to the proposed ban. DOH has provided no scientific data in its proposed rule or Statement of Basis and Purpose that explain why selecting 25 calories per 8 fluid ounces is the appropriate demarcation for bringing a beverage under its proposed rule (or reason why another ratio, either higher or lower, is not scientifically necessary for health reasons). Nor has DOH explained why at 50% "milk or milk product" content a beverage should be excluded from the proposed rule. Picking these numbers without scientific support or rationale reveals these to be pure policy decisions, untethered from any exercise of scientific or technical expertise—not health regulations. There is no evidence or logical reason why such a scheme would be expected to reduce obesity.

Finally, DOH has completely failed to consider the potential unintended consequences of its proposal. DOH has assumed that certain research it relies on regarding portion sizes supports its restriction. But Dr. Brian Wansink, on whose studies DOH relies in its Statement of Basis and Purpose, has explained that his research does not support the assumed effect DOH anticipates from its proposal. Specifically, in Dr. Wansink's "Bottomless Bowls" study, individuals were unaware of how much soup they were consuming and thus larger (but undisclosed) portions led to greater consumption. But the same would not apply here, where individuals purchase beverages in the marketplace and knowingly choose the size of beverage they want to consume.[68] "People who want a little, buy a little, and people who want a lot figure out a way to get it."[69] For this reason, Dr. Wansink stated that he was "really afraid [DOH's proposal] will be an epic failure."[70] And when it fails, "no one will trust that the next big—and perhaps better—idea will work . . . . It poisons the water for ideas that may have more potential."[71] For these reasons, when Dr. Wansink was asked to opine on DOH's proposal, he admonished against moving forward with it.[72]

Furthermore, lab studies have shown that proposals that overtly deny people the portions they are used to having "inspired various forms of rebellion among study participants" including "increased fat or calorie consumption" and "splurge[ing] on snacks and desserts at later meals."[73] Programs focusing solely on one aspect of the diet have the unintended effect of generating dietary substitutions that can lead to even greater caloric consumption. This pattern was documented previously when government policies and literature emphasized a focus on low-fat diets so much so that some consumers overindulged in low- and no-fat cookies, consuming more calories than they would have if eating normal cookies (the Snackwell effect).[74] That reaction can be expected to be repeated and amplified here where it is the government imposing the restriction.

A recent study, From Coke to Coors: A Field Study of a Sugar-Sweetened Beverage Tax and its Unintended Consequences, conducted by Dr. Wansink and others at Cornell University, found that when individuals were discouraged from purchasing SSBs—in this study, a 10% tax on soft drink SSBs was analyzed—the result was that no statistically significant reduction in soft drink SSBs occurred. But a statistically significant increase in the purchase of beer and sugared fruit juices did occur.[75] The study concluded:

> Consistent with the previous literature, we find suggestive evidence that consumers engage in substitution as a result of specific food taxes. Specifically, we found that households that frequently buy beer bought even more beer and that households that frequently bought sugared fruit juices bought even more of those products. Even though we find evidence that the tax triggered sales of water, any health benefit was completely overrun by the additional calories purchased through sugar-sweetened fruit juices. Taxes on less healthy foods may not succeed in reducing sugar-sweetened soft drink consumption, or reducing calorie consumption. Of greater concern is that such a tax may encourage an increased consumption of alcohol among some households.[76]

These findings echo the findings of other studies that examined the unintended consequences of targeted dietary regulation and concluded that policies aimed specifically at SSB calories are completely offset by the consumption of other calories. Thus, an unintended consequence of targeting SSB consumption is that "adults may trade their Pepsi for a Pabst, while some individuals may decide that, because they stopped drinking Coke, they are free to eat more cake."[77]

Perhaps even more concerning is the likelihood that the proposed rule will create a false sense of solution for tackling obesity merely through limiting consumption of SSBs. Not only will this perfunctory gesture have no meaningful impact on overall SSB consumption or in reducing obesity for the reasons stated above, but by giving the false impression that obesity can be addressed by focusing on consumption of SSBs alone, DOH's proposed rule could produce another "Snackwell effect" that leads to increased consumption of all of the high-calorie beverages and foods not covered by the rule.[78] Individuals may mistakenly reason from the rule's sole focus on SSBs that consuming 16-ounces or less of SSBs per day is a comprehensive way for them to "address the obesity epidemic"[79] without regard to their individual energy balance. Since 85% of obese persons already consume no or fewer than 16 ounces of soft drinks per day, and more than 76% drink no or less than 16 ounces of SSBs per day, this obviously would be a very wrong conclusion, yet that is the conclusion that DOH's proposal would invite consumers to reach. And because DOH has declared that limiting SSBs portions to 16 ounces (with free unlimited refills) is an important step in combating obesity, individuals could conclude they are free to consume additional slices of pizza, burgers, hot dogs, muffins, bagels, doughnuts, cheesecake, 20 ounce café mochas, beers, piña coladas, or any of the other foods that DOH has not restricted.

Because the proposed rule fails to consider the science as a whole, which shows that SSBs are not a driver of obesity and that policies aimed at restricting one item of the diet will do nothing to reduce obesity—and potentially could make the problem worse—it should be rejected and rescinded.

III. THE PROPOSED RULE IS UNLAWFUL

Acting by regulatory fiat, in a controversial policy arena where the legislative branch has specifically declined to regulate, the Mayor and the Department of Health and Mental Hygiene seek Board approval to unilaterally impose a drastic measure that intrudes in an unprecedented way upon consumer choice and autonomy, and substantially burdens commerce in an already difficult economic climate, with no discernible benefit. The Department asserts that, "[b]y addressing the increasing size of sugary drinks and reacquainting New Yorkers with more appropriate portion sizes, the City is taking an important step in reducing sugary drink consumption and combating obesity and its resulting morbidity and mortality." City Record at 1574 (June 19, 2012). Yet, the proposed rule is (i) profoundly flawed in its simplistic and scientifically backwards assignment of responsibility for as multifaceted a problem as obesity to certain ounce-sized drinks, (ii) erratic in its coverage, and (iii) riddled with loopholes and exceptions that are not explainable by science or by reason, and cannot be defended as an exercise of agency expertise. At the same time, the rule, if approved, will unduly interfere with consumer choice—including New Yorkers' ability to consume even non-sugary drinks in the sizes they prefer—while imposing needless burdens upon businesses, small and large alike.

The Department of Health lacks the legal authority to impose such an unprecedented intrusion on consumer choice or on businesses. The Department is an administrative agency, and its Board is composed entirely of unelected officials. That is why the agency must follow the legislative will, not supplant it. While the Department of Health is empowered to act in areas governed by already-existing laws—such as ensuring food safety by holding restaurants to basic cleanliness standards—it may not end-run the legislative process and launch on its own initiative major governmental policy programs in an area that the legislature has considered, debated, and declined to address. In particular, it may not adopt a program of standing over the shoulders of New Yorkers and telling them when to put their cups (or forks) down and stop consuming safe and lawful beverages. If government is to take on that unprecedentedly intrusive role, that decision should be made by the people's elected representatives.

This is particularly true here, as the Department and its Board are acting not in a sphere of legislative silence, but in the teeth of the legislature's decision not to micromanage consumer choices about soft drinks or to hamper the ability of businesses to provide customers the lawful products they want in the lawful form they want them. Given the rule's many loopholes and exceptions, it will not have any material effect on consumption (much less obesity). And to the extent that the rule does have any affect on the consumption of sugary drinks (which, as noted in Part II, will have no impact in decreasing obesity), it will only do so by making it more inconvenient and costly for New Yorkers to obtain the covered beverages. Thus, the principal (and perhaps only) effect of the proposed rule may be to increase the cost of sugary drinks in an unfairly retrogressive manner.

But the state legislature has twice already refused to impose a retrogressive tax on such drinks, refusing to give effect to the scientifically specious arguments that such a tax would reduce consumption and therefore combat obesity. Under fundamental separation-of-powers principles that are central to the protection of liberties provided by the New York Constitution, an administrative agency may not arrogate such authority to itself.

The proposed rule would also violate the New York and United States Constitutions' guarantees of equal protection and due process. The portion ban on sugary drinks is so "palpably arbitrary" that it contravenes basic constitutional guarantees against irrational government action. The rule's patchwork and admittedly partial coverage—preventing a hot dog vendor from selling a 20-ounce bottle of soda even though a convenience store on the very same corner can sell the exact same bottle—has no rational health justification. Nor can the rule's many other nonsensical classifications, exceptions, and loopholes be squared with the Department's stated objectives—or anything other than raw policymaking.

The proposed rule likewise implicates significant due process concerns. The measure will unduly infringe upon the personal nutritional choices of every New Yorker, even those that want to fill up a large glass of water, unsweetened iced tea, or diet beverages at a self-serve fountain. And because the rule is so vague and unclear in scope, enforcement will, by necessity, be ad hoc and arbitrary, with businesses afforded no fair notice of the governing rules. Further compounding the measure's infringement upon constitutional values and depriving the rule of the deference ordinarily accorded legislative judgments is the fact that the Department is reaching out to act despite the legislative branch's determination to forego such interference with consumer choice.

Lastly, because the rule would impose needless burdens on interstate commerce by disrupting supply and distribution networks, while affording no commensurate health benefit, it is also constitutionally suspect under the Dormant Commerce Clause of the United States Constitution. The proposed rule does not "reacquaint[] New Yorkers with portion sizes"; it tears that choice out of consumers' hands, retrogressively makes beverages more expensive by depriving customers of the most economical purchase choices, and disproportionately burdens small businesses by simply rerouting customers from one corner store to another.

At bottom, the decision about whether to adopt this rule is about who chooses how much a person drinks or eats of lawful products: New Yorkers themselves, or unelected government officials. Under both the New York and United States Constitutions, these choices are reserved to the people.

A. Under Established Separation-Of-Powers Principles And Statutory Limitations On Its Enumerated Powers, The Department Has No Authority To Promulgate The Proposed Rule

While the Department's delegated authority in health and safety matters is broad, it is not unlimited, and the constitutional and statutory limitations constraining agency action are meaningful. "Even under the broadest and most open-ended of statutory mandates, an administrative agency may not use its authority as a license to correct whatever societal evils it perceives." Boreali v. Axelrod, 71 N.Y.2d 1, 9 (1987).

More specifically, under fundamental separation-of-powers principles enshrined in the New York Constitution, the Department's authority is confined to a gap-filling and enforcement role in areas in which the legislative branch has already spoken and given guidance. The Department's rule would cross that boundary because it proposes to implement, outside of the democratic process, a controversial and untested policy that extends governmental power far beyond where the legislature has gone or has been willing to go. The proposed rule stands in direct conflict with the legislative judgment not to impose financial assessments on sugary drinks as a purported means of combating obesity. The announced goal of changing consumer behavior also contrasts with the Department's historical role of regulating restaurants rather than consumers. And the rule would actively interfere with and inject the government, for the first time, into independent consumer choices about how much of a safe and lawful beverage it is optimal for consumers to ingest as part of caring for their own bodies.

That is an extraordinary expansion of government's role—seeking not to "save" consumers from unsafe products or unsafe ingredients, but to steal away consumers' own free choices about safe products and replace them with wooden and inflexible one-size-fits-all rules.

If government is to cross that line and use its power to supplant individual choice and decision-making, the New York Constitution says that decision should be made, in the first instance and if at all, by the people's representatives in the legislative body (the City Council or state legislature), not through agency fiat.

The fundamental principle that unelected officials in administrative agencies may not exercise legislative choices and declare new policies where the legislative branch has not yet acted has been repeatedly enforced by the New York state and federal courts in analogous circumstances. Simply put, agencies are supposed to follow, not lead. They are supposed to implement statutes and policy decisions made by the legislature through its process of open debate and representative considerations. Agencies are not permitted to make those complicated balancing decisions themselves in the first instance.

For the first time in the history of New York City, the Department proposes government interference with and displacement of New Yorkers' choices about how to partake of safe and lawful products that pose no direct risks to third-parties. The outlines of the proposed regulation, moreover, underscore that the Department is seeking Board approval of quintessentially political, social, and economic judgments that fall outside of its delegated authority, rather than the health and safety judgments that have been assigned to it. But an unelected administrative agency lacks such power to unilaterally "effect a radical shift of authority" from the consumer to its government. Gonzales v. Oregon, 546 U.S. 243, 275 (2006).

1. The New York Constitution Prohibits Agencies From Engaging in Legislative Policy-Making

This proposed rule is novel policymaking, not administrative implementation of legislative policy judgments. In New York, "[i]t is axiomatic that the legislative branch may not constitutionally cede its fundamental policymaking responsibility to a regulatory agency[.]"

Brightonian Nursing Home v. Daines, 93 A.D.3d 1355, 1357 (N.Y. App. Div. 2012) (citations and quotations omitted). For those reasons, "[a] legislative grant of authority must be construed, whenever possible, so that it is no broader than that which the separation of powers doctrine permits." Boreali, 71 N.Y.2d at 9.

The New York Constitution vests the protection of the health of New Yorkers in the state legislature. See N.Y. CONST. art. XVII, § 3 ("The protection and promotion of the health of the inhabitants of the state are matters of public concern and provision therefor shall be made by the state and by such of its subdivisions and in such manner, and by such means as the legislature shall from time to time determine."). As such, the legislature can delegate to local governments the power to adopt and amend local laws, including health laws, id. art. IX, § 2(c), as long as they are "not inconsistent with the provisions of this constitution or any general law" and not otherwise "restrict[ed]" by the state legislature, id. See Municipal Home Rule Law § 10(1)(ii)(a)(12) (same); see also People v. Nemadi, 140 Misc. 2d 712, 718 (N.Y. Crim. Ct. 1988) (recognizing statutory authority for regulation of local health matters, and noting that, under "this scheme New York City has enacted extensive public health regulations").

But such delegation has limits. Most relevant here, the Municipal Home Rule Law allows the "legislative body of a local government * * * [t]o delegate to any officer or agency of such local government * * * the power to adopt resolutions or to promulgate rules and regulations for carrying into effect or fully administering the provisions of any local law," including health and sanitation laws, § 10(4)(a) (emphasis added). And, under the New York City Charter, each agency is empowered only "to adopt rules necessary to carry out the powers and duties delegated to it by or pursuant to federal, state, or local law." NYC Charter § 1043 (emphasis added). In other words, the Department has the power to administer or carry into effect the provisions of local laws, but has not itself been delegated the policymaking or legislative power to create novel legal regimes of its own initiative.

2. The Department's Portion-Size Ban Is Unconstitutional Under Boreali And Its Progeny

In Boreali, the New York Court of Appeals struck down an indoor smoking ban promulgated by the statewide Public Health Council after failed legislative attempts to pass such a ban. It held that, although "the broad enabling statute [creating the agency]" was not itself "an unconstitutional delegation of legislative authority," the agency nevertheless "stretched that statute beyond its constitutionally valid reach when it used the statute as a basis for drafting a code embodying its own assessment of what public policy ought to be." Boreali, 71 N.Y.2d at 9.

Recognizing "the difficult-to-define line between administrative rule-making and legislative policy-making," the Boreali court found that line transgressed when the Council: (1) did not "merely fill in the details of broad legislation describing the over-all policies to be implemented," but "[i]nstead * * * wrote on a clean slate, creating its own comprehensive set of rules without benefit of legislative guidance"; (2) regulated in "an area in which the Legislature had repeatedly tried—and failed—to reach agreement in the face of substantial public debate and vigorous lobbying by a variety of interested factions"; (3) weighed "economic and social concerns," instead of only health concerns, as illustrated by its addition of exemptions and waivers with "no foundation in considerations of public health"; and finally (4) failed to exercise any "special expertise or technical competence in the field of health" in promulgating the challenged regulations. 71 N.Y.2d at 11-14.

The critical factors that led the Boreali court to strike down the state smoking ban regulation—and that have been repeatedly enforced in a stream of cases over the intervening years—would also prove fatal to the proposed rule.[80]

First, the Department would indisputably be writing a new legal regime on a "clean slate," with no guidance or direction from either the state legislature or the City Council authorizing it to decree a scheme of drink-size or calorie-ingestion rules. As such, "the agency's actions [would be] a far cry from the 'interstitial' rule making that typifies administrative regulatory activity[.]" Boreali, 71 N.Y.2d at 13. Instead, the Department would be going "beyond interstitial rule-making and into the realm of legislating." Justiana, 45 F. Supp. 2d at 245; cf. Rent Stabilization Ass'n, 83 N.Y.2d at 170 (regulations are constitutional delegations of authority where agency "has not acted on a clean slate" and "challenged regulations fill in the interstices of the legislative mandate").

[80] Even before Boreali, New York courts had repeatedly "struck down administrative actions undertaken under otherwise permissible enabling legislation where the challenged action could not have been deemed within that legislation without giving rise to a constitutional separation of powers problem." Boreali, 71 N.Y.2d at 11 (citing cases). Federal courts have followed suit, invoking Boreali and permanently enjoining the enforcement of local smoking ordinances promulgated by local health boards. See Dutchess/Putnam Rest. & Tavern Ass'n, 178 F. Supp. 2d at 402 (granting summary judgment and permanent injunction); Leonard v. Dutchess Cty. Dep't of Health, 105 F. Supp. 2d 258, 264–266 (S.D.N.Y. 2000) (same); Justiana v. Niagara Cty. Dep't of Health, 45 F. Supp. 2d 236, 243 (W.D.N.Y. 1999) (same); Nassau Bowling Proprietors Ass'n v. County of Nassau, 965 F. Supp. 376, 379–380 (E.D.N.Y. 1997) (same). Boreali continues to be vibrant precedent, repeatedly serving as the basis to strike down agency action under separation-of-powers principles. See, e.g., Brightonian Nursing Home v. Daines, 93 A.D.3d 1355, 1357 (N.Y. App. Div. 2012); Ellicott Group, LLC v. New York Exec. Dep't Office of Gen. Servs., 85 A.D.3d 48, 52-53 (N.Y. App. Div. 2011; Empire State Ass'n of Assisted Living, Inc. v. Daines, 887 N.Y.S.2d 452, 457-60 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. 2009) (citing Boreali and concluding that the Department of Health assisted-living regulations violated separation of powers); see also American Kennel Club, Inc. v. City of New York, Index No. 13584/89 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. Sept. 19, 1989) (unreported) (invoking Boreali to preliminarily enjoin the New York City Board of Health's administrative regulation of pit bulls because the rule threatened to violate separation-of-powers principles).

Second, the Department proposes to regulate not just in the face of legislative silence, but in contradiction of the legislative judgment. After extensive public debate, the state legislature has twice expressly declined to enact a retrogressive tax on soda consumption, first in 2008 and again in 2010. Yet, to the extent the proposed rule has any impact on sugary drink consumption whatsoever, that effect would result from a retrogressive reduction of consumption through increased cost—thus achieving through backdoor means what the rejected tax would have achieved more directly (albeit imperfectly and with none of the revenue benefits of a tax). Tellingly, the Department's proposal does not set an absolute limit on how much consumers can purchase; it just makes it more difficult (and more expensive) to imbibe the same amount of certain specified sugary drinks in certain places. The Mayor's public commentary and his PowerPoint presentation, although silent as to any such intent, indicate that the expected effect of the ban is to increase the cost per ounce of the covered beverages.[81] Of course, the Department has no authority to impose a tax.[82] And there certainly is no health-based rationale for such a retrogressive regulatory scheme that deprives price-sensitive consumers of the most economical and conveniently available beverage purchases.

Grynbaum, New York Plans to Ban Sale of Big Sizes of Sugary Drinks, N.Y. TIMES, May 30, 2012, A14, available at http://www.nytimes.com/2012/05/31/nyregion/bloomberg-plans-a-ban-on-large-sugared-drinks.html (quoting Mayor as saying that "restaurants could simply charge more for smaller drinks if their sales were to drop").

[82] All taxing powers are vested in the state legislature, and a municipality can only impose a tax if specifically authorized by state law. See Castle Oil Corp. v. City of New York, 89 N.Y.2d 334, 339–40 (1996). Indeed, a municipal tax that is not authorized by legislation is not only invalid under state law, but also violates the tax provision of the New York State Constitution, N.Y. Const. Art. XVI § 1. Moreover, even when a municipal tax is authorized, it can be imposed only "through its legislative body," here the City Council, not by an administrative agency. N.Y. Tax Law § 1201 (McKinney 1201) (rule for municipalities with "a population of one million or more").

Third, for reasons completely unrelated to health or even sugar consumption, the Department's proposal will leave large gaps in coverage that can only be correlated with political, economic, and social considerations. There is no other way to explain the utter arbitrariness of a ban on large-sized sugary drinks that excludes gas stations and convenience stores that are home to the "Big Gulp." Opening loopholes for unlimited refills or multiple purchases also suggests a weighing of economic and political rather than supposed health factors. The erratic targeting of only certain types of sugary drinks, moreover, including sweetened fruit juices, regardless of the amount of nutritional value contained, while broadly excluding alcoholic drinks and dairy drinks suggest raw political judgments rather than a determination drawn along purely health-based lines. But weighing evidence on such political, economic, and social concerns, including by "[s]triking a proper balance among" factors like "health concerns" and "cost," "is a uniquely legislative function" that the Department cannot arrogate to itself. Fagan v. Axelrod, 146 Misc. 2d 286, 299 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. 1990) (weighing evidence is traditionally "a legislative prerogative").

Finally, even though obesity is "unquestionably a health issue," the regulatory lines drawn by the portion-size ban entail no exercise of "special expertise or technical competence in the field of health[.]" Boreali, 71 N.Y.2d at 13-14. The relationship between sugar and calories is well known. Beyond that, the ban's haphazard coverage will simply impede consumer choice and impose heavy administrative burdens on retailers and distributors—with the burdens distributed along erratic administrative lines that have no explicable connection to health policy. Those lines, instead, appear to be explained more by the Department's procrustean effort to strain and cram a wide-ranging and multi-faceted policy problem into its cabined administrative jurisdiction.

There is, after all, no health-specific reason at all why 20-ounce sodas and juice drinks should be banned. And there is certainly no rationale whatsoever, health or otherwise, for the proposed regulation to allow the same drink to be bought from a convenience store but not from the local street vendor outside. Unlike the smoking ban in Boreali, here there are no immediate third-party health effects to consider, and even the direct health effects are, at best, both scientifically baseless and the profoundly attenuated product of a daisy chain of independent consumer decisions that are not for the DOH to dictate. Far from requiring special expertise, the proposed rule is instead simply a blunderbuss approach to a complex societal issue, suffused with private and personal decision-making, into which the legislature has declined to intrude. The Department should respect the constitutional division of powers that has tasked the legislative branch, not an administrative agency, with making the tough policy choices inherent in such controversial measures.[83]

3. The Rule is Ultra Vires

Because the portion-size ban violates the separation of powers, it is in excess of jurisdiction. Independent of the separation-of-powers concerns (although exacerbating them), the proposed rule is also ultra vires because it cannot be defended as an exercise of one of the Department's enumerated powers under the New York City Charter or the Administrative Code.

[83] Just three years Boreali was decided, another New York court upheld a statewide smoking law after it was passed by the state legislature (not imposed by a regulatory agency). See Fagan, 146 Misc. 2d at 293. In upholding the measure, Fagan distinguished Boreali, which involved "the sufficiency of the legislative delegations upon which * * * an administrative agency[] based its authority to promulgate its now-stricken regulations," from a case involving "the authority of the Legislature itself to enact that which the Public Health Council sought to accomplish by administrative regulation." Id. (emphasis added). It also noted how Boreali had highlighted that "[t]he policy objective of minimizing nonsmokers' exposure and balancing [the] same against economic and social considerations would be best addressed by direct legislation rather than relying on the amorphous and general delegations contained in the enabling statute that created the" administrative agency. Id.

As an administrative agency, the Department may not "'bootstrap' or increase its own jurisdiction by administrative fiat, i.e., by promulgating rules that enlarge its powers." 439 East 88 Owners Corp. v. Tax Com'n of City of New York, 2002 WL 32799697, *5 (N.Y. Sup. 2002).

Typically, New York City regulates its own local health affairs through City Council enactments, which are enforced, regulated, supervised, and promoted through the Department of Health, including via the Health Code as promulgated by the Board of Health. In this case, however, the Council has not passed legislation. But the Department, unlike the Council, is not vested with plenary legislative authority, and it cannot by rule resuscitate legislation that the Council declined to adopt.. Rather, as an administrative agency in the executive branch of City government (whose Commissioner and members are appointed by, and serve at the pleasure of, the Mayor, see N.Y. Charter §§ 551, 553-554), the Department of Health is instead vested with non-plenary regulatory authority.

The Department's authority is limited to its enumerated powers: the Department is authorized to "regulate all matters affecting health in the city of New York" and to "perform all those functions and operations performed by the city that relate to the health of the people of the city, including but not limited to the mental health, mental retardation, alcoholism and substance abuse-related needs of the people of the city." Id. § 556. Its enumerated provisions make clear, however, that its role is to "[e]nforce" provisions of laws related to health, id. § 556(a), "review" public health services and submit findings to the Mayor, id. § 556(b), "[s]upervis[e]" matters affecting public health, id. § 556(c), and "[p]romot[e] or provi[de]" public health services, id. § 556(d) (emphases added).

The portion-size ban cannot be justified by this list of enumerated regulatory powers. The proposed rule embodies quintessentially legislative judgments, and it is unmoored from any scientific basis. Its result will be unprecedented government interference with New Yorkers' freedom to drink lawful beverages as they see fit (with at best an attenuated link to caloric constraint and no established connection to obesity reduction). And, to the extent the rule does reduce consumption at all, it will do so by making it more difficult to obtain large-sized, more economical, beverages (particularly in poorer neighborhoods with less access to grocery or convenience stores that are outside the Department's jurisdiction) and by increasing the per-unit prices of the covered beverages (if the Mayor's public statements that the program will simply make sugary drinks more expensive are correct).

Nothing in the Board's enumerated powers, however, commission it to make consumer freedom of choice dependent upon income levels or geography. It is true that the Board of Health is authorized to add to or amend the city's health code "for security of life and health in the city," id. § 558(b), and those actions are properly considered "a quasi-legislative act of an administrative body, rather than an act promulgated by a legislative body," Peckham Materials Corp. v. Westchester County, 303 A.D.2d 511, 511 (N.Y. App. Div. 2003); see Carr v. Schmid, 105 Misc. 2d 645, 647 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. 1980). But, contrary to the Department's assertions, the proposed rule will not secure either life or health; it simply transfers decisional power from individuals to governmental officials, and would allow the Department to curtail New Yorkers' freedom selectively and haphazardly, while arbitrarily burdening commerce, with no discernible benefits, and without any scientific support.

The Department and its Board, moreover, must also ensure that the Health Code is consistent "with the constitution, laws of this state or this charter." N.Y. Charter § 558(b). Importantly, nowhere does the City Charter allow the Department to make policy in the manner proposed, to interfere with consumer choice, or to ban or limit the sale of an otherwise lawful and safe product. Cf. id. § 556(c)(9) (Department may "supervise and regulate the food and drug supply of the city * * * and ensure that such businesses and activities are conducted in a manner consistent with the public interest and by persons with good character, honesty and integrity.") (emphasis added).[84] Nor has the City Council ever authorized the Department to set policy in this manner. It is difficult, if not impossible, to fathom how limiting the freedom with which individual New Yorkers can quench their thirst with lawful beverages of their choice (that, unlike alcohol or tobacco, pose no direct harm to third parties) can fall within the purview of protecting the health and safety of food service establishments. Simply put, the Department is empowered to regulate businesses, not people, and to ban unsafe products, not to force the government's preferred choices on individuals.

After all, it is one thing to protect citizens from unsafe products. It is something quite different to claim the power to "protect" citizens from their own choices about safe products. If the Department can supplant individuals' choices about how much juice or soda to drink, it could equally ban the sale of large pizzas, hefty corned beef sandwiches, or giant desserts (measures which would be equally justified by the proposed "science," as all calories count, and the portion sizes of these items has been increasing more over time than the sizes of sugary drinks). But limiting New Yorkers' choices about how much to eat or drink improperly crosses a regulatory line: the Department's proposed rule would fundamentally change the relationship between the government and the governed. Administrative agencies may not trespass on the legislative role and implement controversial policy measures where the legislature has refused to act—particularly in those areas where fundamental liberty interests are at stake. See Gonzales, 546

[84] Underscoring the point, the Department's only "policy" delegation is to "make policy and plan for, monitor, evaluate and exercise general supervision over all services and facilities for the mentally disabled within the department's jurisdiction[.]" N.Y. Charter § 556(c)(3).

U.S. at 267-68 ("The importance of the issue of physician-assisted suicide, which has been the subject of an earnest and profound debate across the country, * * * makes the oblique form of the claimed delegation all the more suspect.").

4. Other Department Health Regulations Did Not Pose Similar Separation-of-Powers or Ultra Vires Concerns

Unlike previous measures implemented by the Department like the smoking ban, the trans fat ban, and calorie display requirements, here the Department, under the guise of its "historic power to regulate restaurants" and "food safety" in New York City, City Record at 1574, avowedly seeks to regulate not restaurants, not food safety, but consumers' portioning decisions. By eliminating consumer choice and imposing in its place a wooden, agency-prescribed, one-size-fits all rule, DOH would be venturing where no legislative action has gone—and in fact where the legislature declined to go. Specifically, the Department seeks to assert the unprecedented power to micromanage the amount of New Yorkers' ingestion of products that are perfectly lawful to buy and safe to consume, notwithstanding the state legislature's prior consideration and rejection of analogous measures.

Previous Department measures regulations involved keeping products deemed to be unsafe outside of food service establishments, or providing consumers with the information to make their own informed choices. The Department has never before attempted to force New Yorkers to hew to a governmentally dictated optimal diet. For good reason. As noted above, if that line is to be crossed at all, it must be crossed first by the legislature, not an unelected administrative body.

No previous measure proposed by the Department has given rise to similar constitutional concerns.[85] It was a legislative body—the City Council—and not the Board of Health, that enacted the successful New York City Smoke-Free Air Act. And the Council did so only after a robust legislative process. See C.L.A.S.H., Inc. v. City of New York, 315 F. Supp. 2d 461, 491 (S.D.N.Y. 2004) (describing comprehensive process, including extensive legislative debate, presentation of testimony by over 200 witnesses, and record replete with scientific evidence from all sides, that preceded enactment of Local Law 47). Here as well, the state Legislature and, by express delegation, the City Council of New York, not an administrative agency like the Department, are the entities vested with the legislative power to enact the proposed rule. And any such enactment would emerge only after open and transparent democratic debate by the people's representatives, as opposed to a rushed, two-hour hearing that the Mayor's administrative appointees do not even attend.

With regard to the trans fat ban, the City Council, within a mere four months of the Board's December 2006 action approving the Department's proposal, enacted follow-on legislation "to incorporate the ban on artificial trans fat into the Administrative Code," Int. No. 0517-2007, thereby mooting any potential separation-of-powers or ultra vires concerns. In addition, that categorical ban on trans fats operated upon the restaurant owner by banning the use of an unsafe ingredient in food. It did not permit consumers to partake of a lawful product, yet then purport to tell them how, where, and when to stop eating. Consistent with the underlying health and safety rationale, the ban was categorically applied to all foods prepared in FSEs, [85] See, e.g., New York State Rest. Ass'n v. New York City Bd. of Health, 08 CIV. 1000 (RJH), 2008 WL 1752455 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 16, 2008) (no separation-of-powers argument in challenge to the calorie display regulation; argument instead focused on preemption and free speech) , aff'd, 556 F.3d 114 (2d Cir. 2009); cf. C.L.A.S.H., 315 F. Supp. 2d at 491 (challenging the smoking ban, Local Law 47, which was a Council enactment, not a Board regulation).

rather than crannied with exceptions (even for the FSEs within the Department's jurisdiction), that are scientifically baseless and cannot be justified by any health rationale.[86]

And with regard to the calorie-posting requirement, the Second Circuit noted that the ordinance served interstitially to fill a gap in federal law, complementing a backdrop of federal regulatory requirements in the sphere of nutritional labeling. See New York Rest Ass'n v. New York City Bd. of Health, 556 F.3d 114, 131 (2009). The Board simply required restaurants to make the same informational disclosures that are on food labels generally. This legislation-following and gap-filling role is one that administrative agencies traditionally play. Here, by contrast, the agency would be legislation-defying and gap-creating. Furthermore, as a solely informational requirement, the calorie-posting mandate fit more comfortably within the Department's broad authority to educate and promote public health education. See, e.g., N.Y. Charter § 556(d)(4)-(5) (Department has the enumerated power to "promote or provide for public education on * * * the prevention and control of disease"). The proposed rule, by contrast, deprives consumers of the ability to make informed choices; it instead superimposes the government choice in their place.

Like the smoking ban struck down in Boreali—and unlike the trans fat ban or the calorie-disclosure rule—the proposed regulation is also pervaded with exceptions, qualifications, and limitations, many of which backpedal on the supposed health-protection rationale. As demonstrated in Part II, there is no health or safety justification for not applying the rule to alcohol, milkshakes, or iced lattes. Nor do health or safety rationales explain the decision to allow ingestion of two 16-ounce bottles of soda but not one 20-ounce bottle. Even less justifiable is the determination to ban the sale of 20-ounce sodas by street carts, but not by the convenience stores right across the street.

Ultimately, the Department is proposing here, for the first time, to draw policy lines infused with political, economic, social, and cultural considerations, not health or science. Yet, that is precisely what demarcates the constitutional line between permissible rulemaking and impermissible agency lawmaking under Boreali. If such fundamental and complex policy judgments are to be made, with resulting intrusions into the traditional sphere of personal choice about how much to eat or drink, they should be undertaken by the people's representatives after an open and accountable legislative debate.

B. The Proposed Portion-Size Ban Is "Palpably Arbitrary," And Would Violate The Equal Protection Clauses Of The Federal And State Constitutions

The Equal Protection Clause of the United States Constitution, U.S. CONST. amend XIV, § 1, like its counterpart in the New York Constitution, N. Y. CONST. Art. 1, § 11, protects against arbitrary governmental action.[87] Here, the proposed rule is so shot through with gaps, holes, qualifications, and limitations on the one hand, while covering behavior that has nothing to do with its stated objectives on the other, that it lacks any rationally coherent operation, failing to satisfy even the deferential rational basis standard under which courts generally review economic and social laws. See FCC v. Beach Commc'ns, Inc., 508 U.S. 307, 313 (1993). In short, a "palpably arbitrary" rule, like the Department's, would violate the Equal Protection Clause. Nordlinger v. Hahn, 505 U.S. 1, 2 (1992). The Department's measure cannot survive because its "exemptions, collectively, erode the rationality of the * * * scheme as a whole."

[87] The Equal Protection Clauses of the Federal and New York Constitutions are coextensive. See Pinnacle Nursing Home v. Axelrod, 928 F.2d 1306, 1317 (2d Cir. 1991).

Kittery Motorcycle Inc. v. Rowe, 320 F.3d 42, 48 (1st Cir. 2003). Moreover, the rule's over-inclusiveness and under-inclusiveness are so severe that it is inconceivable that the lines that are drawn "rationally further[] the posited state interest." Nordlinger, 505 U.S. at 34-35 (Stevens, J., dissenting); see also Jimenez v. Weinberger, 417 U.S. 628, 636-638 (1974). Thus, "[t]he [Department] may not rely on a classification whose relationship to an asserted goal is so attenuated as to render the distinction arbitrary or irrational." Prodell v. State, 166 Misc.2d 608, 613 (Sup. Ct., Albany County 1995) (quoting City of Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Center at 473 U.S. 432, 446 (1985)). Instead, "[t]he [Department] must proceed upon a rational basis and may not resort to a classification that is palpably arbitrary.'" Margolis v. N.Y. City Transit Authority, 157 A.D.2d 238, 240-41 (N.Y. App. Div. 1990).

1. The Department's Proposed Portion-size Ban Is Riddled With Arbitrary Classifications

The list of arbitrary distinctions, nonsensical lines, unjustifiable loopholes, and inexplicable choices reflected in the Department's proposed rule is long:

- A calorie is a calorie. As detailed in Part II, there is no scientific support for the proposal to target only certain single-sale volumes of a subset of sugary drinks, rather than the manifold additional sugar-laden drinks (including alcohol) and other food sources of excess calories and/or excess sugar (not to mention the multitude of non-caloric explanations for obesity problems, such as insufficient physical activity or the lack of access to fresh foods in urban environments). The proposed rule rests on the scientifically false premise that consumption of SSBs drives obesity, when in reality, obesity is the result of multiple causes that, taken together, result in an individualized energy imbalance. This facially incomplete targeting of caloric consumption from certain sizes of SSBs in certain places is arbitrary and so ineffectually short-changed as to not establish a rational basis for tackling obesity at all.
- Gaps in retailer coverage, and in particular, the exclusion of gas stations and convenience stores, which likely represent a significant percentage of the "Big Gulp" market share, suggest that the rule will be easily circumvented (at least by those with access to those alternative sources). It makes no sense that a Subway attached to a gas station quik mart cannot sell a 20-oz bottle of soda, but the quik mart itself can, right under the same roof, or that the same sugary molecule is available without restrictions in a lobby vending machine, but not within a restaurant.

- Even for the establishments that are covered, loopholes in the measure—including the right to free refills, lack of clarity on the amount of ice allowed, possible promotions such as two-for-one deals, and the availability of unlimited sugar that New Yorkers can add to their beverages at will on the table of every restaurant in New York—demonstrate that, even for that limited portion of the beverage market under the Board's purported jurisdiction, there is no rational relationship between the regulation and reducing obesity. Consumers who want to drink large amounts of the covered SSBs will still be able to do so, just with more effort and, if the Mayor's predictions are correct, possibly, at higher prices.

- The rule is also irrationally over-inclusive, prohibiting self-service cups of over 16 ounces, even if New Yorkers want to serve themselves unsweetened iced tea, diet soda, or water from a self-serve fountain. The ease-of-enforcement rationale posited by the Department cannot justify a measure that impedes New Yorkers from freely consuming beverages with no conceivable link to obesity, and that, in the case of water, for example, have recognized health-benefits.

- The measure is regressive and disproportionately affects low-income consumers who rely upon the cost-savings of large beverage containers, typically have less access to a wide range of shopping options where economical large-sized beverages will be freely available, and lack the means to pay for additional small containers to consume the same amount. More expensive high-calorie, milk-based coffee drinks are exempt from the proposed rule, as are sugar-laden alcoholic beverages, and juice- and yogurt-based smoothies, all beverages which have more sugar per ounce than regular cola and are more costly. It is the beverage choices of everyday working New Yorkers that are under attack.[88] For example, families accustomed to buying one super-sized beverage and sharing it at a movie or sporting event, or construction workers who buy one beverage to nurse all day long, in order to cut down on per-unit cost, may not be able to afford the alternative option of more smaller-sized beverages at a higher per-unit cost.[89]

- Finally, the portion size limits themselves are irrational and unconnected to any valid science. Even researchers cited by the Department itself have stated that the [88] Because the proposed rule is likely to unduly impact marginalized low-income populations that have less access to venues not under the Department's jurisdiction, and may be less able to pay more to consume the amount of beverages they want at higher prices, more searching judicial review may also be justified on this basis.

[89] See Appendix D (collection of articles regarding effect of proposed rule); see also Jen Doll, The Classist Side of Mayor Bloomberg's War on Soda, The Atlantic Wire, May 31, 2012; Brian Wansink & David Just, How Bloomberg's Soft Drink Ban Will Backfire on NYC Public Health, The Atlantic, June 14, 2012 > rule will be an "epic failure" and warned against its adoption.[90] In contrast to those researchers' controlled studies (where the test subjects were not informed of changes in portion sizes), mandating a change of behavior against people's wishes is predicted to have the counterproductive effect of instigating demand for larger-sized beverages, as people rebel against unwanted government controls. Likewise, substitution of other calories, via the "Snackwell effect," or thirsty spectators at a sporting event who end up choosing beer when they want a large-sized drink, because large-sized sodas or lemonades are unavailable, could end up having a net negative effect on health and obesity rates. And, like a fad diet, the proposed rule could mistakenly give New Yorkers the impression that complying with arbitrary limits on SSB consumption is all they need to do to manage their weight, when in reality, obesity is the result of myriad factors, and there is no "magic bullet," sugar-sweetened, or otherwise, that can so readily fix the problem.

In short, the economic and political policy choices made by the Department in crafting the rule not only lie outside their vested authority, they actually have no rational linkage to the purported goal of combating obesity. The agency's ungrounded choices readily demonstrate that the Department would be legislating impermissibly, traveling way beyond its authority to regulate food safety, and resulting in a cobbled-together measure that is "palpably arbitrary." Such disordered coverage seems inevitably unable to do anything to combat the consumption problem it supposedly targets. Indeed, when announcing the proposed rule, Mayor Bloomberg tried to assure New Yorkers that his regulation was not "taking things away."[91] But creating a regulatory crazy quilt that does nothing, in practice, to prevent the very consumption that allegedly contributes to obesity, yet impermissibly intrudes upon free choice and unduly burdens commerce, is the very definition of arbitrariness and irrationality.

2. The Proposed Rule Does Not Reflect Reasoned Incrementalism

The proposed rule also cannot be defended as a legitimate determination to move incrementally "one step at a time, addressing itself to the phase of the problem which seems most acute to the legislative mind." Williamson v. Lee Optical of Okla., Inc., 348 U.S. 483, 489 (1955). The rule's Swiss-cheese coverage bears no perceptible relationship to the obesity problem: whether sodas are purchased from a transient food truck or a food cart with a fixed location, in a restaurant or at a convenience store, the calories in the drinks are the same. Likewise, the ability of consumers to easily end-run the ban with refills or multiple purchases strips it of any realistic capacity to function even in calorie reduction. The ban, in other words, will quickly become all burden with no discernible gain. Even if expected price effects do result in some decline in consumption (particularly among lower-income groups), as Part II amply demonstrates, reducing the consumption of SSBs, without more, is unlikely to have any impact on the ultimate goal of combating obesity.

Nor is there any serious argument that the Department has targeted only the most acute, important, or rationally severable aspect of the problem or, quite frankly, that there is any obesity-combating rhyme or reason to the regulatory pattern. Instead, the apparent (and only) explanation for the ban's irrational coverage is that it tracks the jurisdictional reach of the Department of Health to carry out routine health inspections of food service establishments. That will not do. DOH's war of attrition against its jurisdictional boundaries and reasoned incrementalism are not the same thing. Under the Equal Protection Clause, "[t]he classification must reflect pre-existing differences" in the nature of the problem itself; the law "cannot create new ones that are supported by only their own bootstraps." Williams v. Vermont, 472 U.S. 14, 27 (1985). The classification, in other words, "'must rest upon some ground of difference having a fair and substantial relation to the objective of the legislation.'" Margolis, 157 A.D.2d at 241

(quoting Allied Stores of Ohio v. Bowers, 358 U.S. 522, 527 (1958)). Here, prohibiting a 20 ounce soda to be sold from a food truck, but allowing the same beverage to be sold at the gas station where the truck is parked has not "fair and substantial relation" to combating obesity. If the Department of Health's jurisdiction is too limited to support a coherent scheme of regulation, the proper conclusion is that it lacks the delegated authority to regulate the subject matter.

3. Less Deference Is Owed To Unilateral Agency Action

Policy choices made by democratically elected and accountable legislators are due deference by the courts precisely because it is the role of the legislature to strike difficult policy balances and to draw lines after an open and deliberative process. See, e.g., City of New Orleans v. Dukes, 427 U.S. 297, 303 (1976) (upholding an ordinance enacted by the New Orleans City Council under rational basis review, where the council's authority was unquestioned, and noting that the "judiciary may not sit as a superlegislature to judge the wisdom or desirability of legislative policy determinations") (emphasis added). It is the nature of the process—not the mere fact that a rule has been issued by some governmental unit—that triggers the need for judicial deference. Thus, judges are more deferential in their review of legislation because they realize that "the problems of government are practical ones and may justify, if they do not require, rough accommodations—illogical, as it may be, and unscientific." Metropolis Theatre Co. v. City of Chicago, 228 U.S. 61, 69-70 (1913). It is judicial recognition of such legislative horse trading that allows courts to defer to legislative choices, even when such choices are "needless and wasteful," because "it is for the legislature, not the courts, to balance the advantages and disadvantages." Lee Optical, 348 U.S. at 487 (emphasis added).

Here, however, there is no "legislative" process to which a court could defer, and the proposed, unprecedented rule is being submitted to a body that is supposed to be policy-following not policymaking. In such circumstances, courts have no institutional obligation to defer to "any conceivable basis" supporting the rule. Rather, the Department, if purporting to bypass the legislative process by virtue of expert agency status, must demonstrate, based on its purported expertise, how the rule will achieve its desired objectives. As the evidence presented in the scientific comments shows the Department cannot satisfy that burden.

C. The Proposed Rule Would Infringe Upon Liberty And Property Interests In Violation Of Due Process, And Would Be Void For Vagueness

The Due Process Clause, U.S. CONST. amend XIV, § 1, and its counterpart in the New York Constitution, Art. 1, § 6, prohibit governmental deprivations of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.[92] The Constitution confers a substantive due process right to be free from arbitrary governmental action that "infringes a protected right." O'Connor v. Pierson, 426 F.3d 187, 200 n.6 (2d Cir. 2005). A law may also be so arbitrary as to violate the Due Process Clause, even absent infringement of a protected right. See, e.g., Stern v. Halligan, 158 F.3d 729, 731 (3d Cir. 1993) (stating that general economic and social welfare legislation violates substantive due process when it fails to meet a minimum rationality standard); American Express Travel Related Servs. Co. v. Kentucky, 641 F.3d 685, 688-89 (6th Cir. 2011) (same). This proposed rule transgresses that line.

The proposed SSB size ban infringes upon consumers' liberty interests in being able to choose for themselves how to manage bodily care, to make informed diet decisions, to ingest calories and to control how much of a lawful and safe product they choose to consume. Courts have long recognized that people have a right to bodily integrity and to be free from government interference with their individual health decisions. See, e.g., Lombardi v. Whitman, 485 F.3d 73,

[92] As with equal protection, the "New York State's Constitution's guarantee of due process is virtually coextensive with that of the U.S. Constitution." Algarin v. New York City Dept. of Correction, 460 F. Supp. 2d 469, 478 (S.D.N.Y. 2006), aff'd 267 F. App'x 24 (2d Cir. 2008) (citing Century Sav. Bank v. City of New York, 280 N.Y. 9, 10 (1939)).

79 (2d Cir. 2007) (recognizing that "the substantive component of due process encompasses, among other things, an individual's right to bodily integrity free from unjustifiable governmental interference" and citing Washington v. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 702, 720 (1997)). See also Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Dep't of Health, 497 U.S. 261, 278 (1990) (affirming the "principle that a competent person has a constitutionally protected liberty interest in refusing unwanted medical treatment").

In this case, the products at issue have been deemed safe for consumption and they have no immediate and proven adverse health effects on the consumer or on third parties (like smoke or alcohol can have)—that is why they remain freely available in smaller sizes, for multiple purchases, and in all sizes in convenience and grocery stores. And any purported medical costs associated with obesity that are shared by third parties cannot be, as the science comments have demonstrated, readily traced back to consumption of SSBs—in stark contrast to the recognized and direct health effects of smoking or alcohol consumption. The proposed rule, in other words, is not about the health or safety of FSEs, but is about agency overreaching in an effort to dictate consumer behavior that is not its to control.

The Constitutions' protection of individual liberty should not permit the government to intrude into personal health decisions like the amount of a beverage (or food) to ingest at any one sitting. The liberty clause, in other words, because it draws a line protecting fundamental conceptions of individual autonomy and bodily privacy, should also protect individuals from palate police or body-mass-index superintendents. To permit the government to impose restrictions on the amounts of certain drinks that citizens may consume allows no rational stopping point. The same logic that supports the proposed rule could also result in a law insisting that all families consume a set menu dictated by a Bureau of Government-Prescribed

Eating, to ensure that everyone obtains the governmentally preferred caloric balance and distribution of nutrients. Both calorie and nutrient consumption, moreover, would be governmentally prescribed (like the rule here) through sweeping and wooden rules, designed for mass enforcement, without any mechanism for the individualized considerations that are the hallmark of true health assessments. Further, those categorical rules would be based on a governmentally endorsed presentation of the ever-changing scientific literature that, as here, could be inaccurate and incomplete.

The New York and United States Constitutions leave such fundamental decisions about how to live life to the individual and the family. At the very least, authorization of government intrusion into this sphere of personal choice, and the decisions about how and when to interfere, should be made, if at all, by the elected representatives that are directly accountable to New Yorkers, not by regulatory fiat. It is doubtful indeed that an unelected and unaccountable agency has such "power to effect a radical shift of authority" from the consumer to its government. Gonzales, 546 U.S. at 275.

Second, property rights of ABA's manufacturers and distributors—such as those in existing merchandising and packaging, or the good will and retail preferences of consumers accustomed to purchasing large-sized beverages—will be jeopardized by the proposed rule.[93] Where, as here, "there is no rational relationship between the legislation and a legitimate legislative purpose," Beatie v. City of New York, 123 F.3d 707, 711 (2d Cir. 1997) (emphasis added; citing Kelley v. Johnson, 425 U.S. 238, 247 (1976)), any deprivation of property, no matter how slight, is not justifiable.[94]

A third and final basis for due process concerns is that the rule's "prohibitions are not clearly defined," rendering it void for vagueness. Grayned v. City of Rockford, 408 U.S. 104, 108 (1972). Such confusion in a law's content fails to give the regulated public fair notice of the conduct that is forbidden, contrary to fundamental due process principles. As the Supreme Court has recently affirmed, this "requirement of clarity in regulation is essential to the protections provided by the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment," which "requires the invalidation of laws that are impermissibly vague." FCC v. Fox, No. 10-1293, at 12 (June 21, 2012). Overly vague regulations impermissibly vest the basic line-drawing decisions under the law in the ad hoc and subjective day-to-day resolution of varied enforcement officials, creating a substantial risk of arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement. Id.; see also Grayned, 408 U.S. at 108.

As drafted, the proposed rule gives rise to several void-for-vagueness claims. For example, will businesses be allowed to provide two-for-one deals or other bulk purchase specials? Can pushcart vendors sell larger bottles to be split between several customers? Should servers factor in the amount of ice when determining ounce or caloric limitations? Will coffeehouses be permitted to sell a 20-oz iced-coffee to a customer who requests addition of sugary syrup that puts the beverage over the rule's caloric threshold? May New Yorkers continue to use their own previously purchased "Big Gulp" cups under preexisting loyalty discount programs (for example, at sports venues)? Some businesses cannot even be sure when they are covered by the rule, and consumers, certainly, are unlikely to understand why they can't get the drink they prefer in their neighborhood deli, but can walk across the street to the gas station and buy the exact same beverage.[95] Absent sufficient notice of what practices are proscribed, businesses will operate under the specter of potential fines and arbitrary enforcement.

[94] Note that this deferential standard derives from a case addressing challenges to government regulation of government employees, a factor found to be "highly significant," in upholding a regulation limiting the length of policemen's hair. See Kelley, 425 U.S. at 245. But here, the proposed rule applies to the citizenry at large and the Department therefore bears a greater burden in defending its rule than it would if applied only to public employees (or to children, under the in loco parentis jurisdiction of the State). As Justice Powell noted in his concurrence in Kelley, a reasonable regulation for an informed police force would be an "impermissible intrusion upon liberty in a different context." Id. at 249.

D. Because The Proposed Rule Would Be All Burden And No Benefit, It Likewise Would Violate The Dormant Commerce Clause

The Commerce Clause of the federal Constitution, U.S. CONST., Art. 1, § 8, forbids state regulation that imposes burdens on interstate commerce that clearly exceed the putative local gains, particularly where the regulatory objective "could be promoted as well with a lesser impact on interstate activities." Pike v. Bruce Church, Inc., 397 US 137, 142 (1970). The Board's proposed regulation does just that, while casting aside without consideration a host of alternative measures that could achieve the Board's objectives as well or even better without imposing extraordinary burdens on interstate commerce.

By precluding the sale in New York of bottled beverages lawful in the surrounding localities and States, New York City will burden not just sales within New York, but also impede the free flow of goods to areas outside of the city and the State. Smaller beverage companies may be effectively precluded from selling larger bottled beverages in areas outside of New York City because of the ban. Many beverage products are produced only in sizes exceeding the proposed ban. Faced with an inability to sell their products in major New York City sales outlets,

[95] There is some confusion as to which establishments qualify as "food service establishments," as defined by Section 81.03(s) of the Health Code, as a "place where food is provided for individual portion service directly to the consumer whether such food is provided free of charge or sold, and whether consumption occurs on or off the premises or is provided from a pushcart, stand or vehicle." It is unclear whether grocery stores with deli counters, or convenience or drug stores that sell hot dogs or sandwiches, fall under this definition.

beverage companies will be forced either (i) to develop expensive and burdensome dual supply, production, and distribution operations in order to sell smaller versions only in New York, (ii) to conform their nationwide packaging to New York City's mandate, or (iii) simply to determine it is infeasible to stay in the marketplace in New York. Any company wishing to serve both New York City and Newark, for example, must re-configure its production and distribution networks to segregate larger bottled beverages from delivery to covered New York City sales outlets, increasing the need for warehouse space, lengthening and increasing the cost of distribution routes, and impairing the ability of beverage companies to shift products across borders to meet swift changes in consumer demand. Interstate companies must also wall off New York City consumers from their national promotional and marketing campaigns.

Imposing barriers to the free flow of goods outside of the City, and disproportionate burdens on non-local commercial entities serving markets outside the City is impermissible under the Commerce Clause unless justified by real—not theoretical—local benefits that cannot be served by less burdensome measures. See Town of Southold v. Town of East Hampton, 477 F. 3d 38, 51 (2d Cir. 2007). Moreover, when the effect [that] would arise if not one, but many or every State [or city] adopted similar legislation" is considered, Healy v. Beer Institute, 491 U.S. 324, 336 (1998), the danger to the free flow of national commerce is patent. If each local jurisdiction with authority to regulate the health and safety of restaurants chose to independently set maximum sizes for its own designated group of beverages, and did so drawing the type of arbitrary lines proposed by the Department, the result would be an impossible patchwork quilt that would be enormously disruptive to national commerce.

The Board's proposed measure simply will not generate real local benefits sufficient to justify the immense burdens on interstate commerce that will occur, even if no other jurisdictions impose their own variants of the measure, especially in light of the numerous alternative approaches that the Board has not even considered, much less attempted. As discussed above, the science establishes that the Board's proposed regulation will not even reduce the consumption of "sugary drinks," much less achieve the Board's stated goal of reducing obesity. On the other hand, the Board has bypassed numerous less-burdensome measures with proven results. For example, beverage companies have proven ready and willing to collaborate with government authorities and the public to improve health and wellness through informational disclosures and responsiveness to consumer choice. To that end, the industry has worked hard to provide consumers clear calorie information and a wide range of products from which consumers can make the appropriate choice for themselves and their families, including by providing simple and understandable calorie information right on the front of beverage packaging for closed containers in the industry's Clear on Calories initiative. Likewise, to help educate children and provide them with nutritious beverage options, the beverage industry's School Beverage Guidelines initiative removed full-calorie soft drinks from all schools and provided students with a range of lower-calorie beverage options.

The Department has made absolutely no attempt to initiate a dialogue with the beverage industry, restaurant owners, or other affected businesses about further ways in which they and the government could partner to promote informed consumer decision-making or otherwise to combat obesity without imposing draconian burdens on interstate commerce. The Constitution simply does not permit imposing significant and one-sided burdens on interstate commerce with no proportional local benefit.

E. In Addition To Its Constitutional Infirmities, The Proposed Portion Ban Is Arbitrary, Capricious, And Unsupported By Substantial Evidence

Beyond the proposed rule's many constitutional infirmities, it is also fatally vulnerable to an administrative challenge brought under Article 78 of New York's Civil Practice Law and Rules. As established above, the portion-size ban is contrary to law, ultra vires, and exceeds the Department's jurisdiction, because it cannot be justified as an exercise of one of the Department's enumerated powers. It is also arbitrary and capricious, and unsupported by substantial evidence. See CPLR § 7803.

The result of the Department's attempt to shoehorn a proposal whose true aim is to alter human consumption patterns into a regulatory scheme not designed for such regulatory reach produces a rule that makes no sense, even on its own terms. If left intact, the Department's rule, as drafted, would not survive judicial review as it is arbitrary and capricious. See N.Y. C.P.L.R. 7803 (allowing suits to determine, inter alia, "whether a[n agency] determination was made in violation of lawful procedure, was affected by an error of law or was arbitrary and capricious or an abuse of discretion").

The proposed portion-size ban, if approved without change, would be subject to various fatal flaws, as detailed in the equal protection discussion, including: the utter absence of any rational scientific basis to target calories in SSBs, as opposed to other sources of calories; the proposed rule's uneven coverage—resulting in scope that is both over-inclusive (in prohibiting unfettered consumption of water and diet soda) and under-inclusive (in allowing a convenience store to sell the exact same beverage that the vendor standing on the sidewalk in front of it cannot, and in failing to cover alcoholic beverages or other sources of sugar); the fact that the rule is easily evadable, particularly for those with more resources and greater mobility, but for the less privileged, the rule is likely to have a retrogressive effect; and finally, the proposed rule's vague and inconclusive drafting leaves more questions left unanswered than resolved. Whether considered separately or cumulatively, such problems demonstrate the arbitrary nature of the Department's flawed attempt to impermissibly legislate through regulatory dictate.

Nor should the Department's version of the science be accepted. The evidence demonstrates that consumption of SSBs is not a unique, or even important, driver of obesity rates. All calories count, and only comprehensive measures that address net energy balance—considering all caloric sources, and the amount of activity, rather than the facile scapegoating of one particular part of one particular set of calories—will work to address obesity. Contrary to the Department's inaccurate and incomplete characterization of the evidence, as a percentage of Americans' diet, calories from sources other than SSBs play a far greater role, and have, over the years, increased more than calories from SSBs. Simply put, the Department has failed to present a credible scientific justification for its SSB-only proposed rule.

In sum, weighing the record evidence as a whole, as a reviewing court would under the substantial evidence standard, there is no reasoned basis for the Department's proposal to intrude upon New Yorkers' freedom to drink lawful products as they choose, with no restrictions on manner or place. See Ridge Road Fire Dist. v. Schiano, 16 N.Y. 3d 494, 499 (N.Y. 2011) (substantial evidence requires "such relevant proof as a reasonable mind may accept as adequate to support a conclusion or ultimate fact.") Nor, as explained in the Dormant Commerce Clause analysis, are the expected burdens on commerce at all justified, given the absence of any likely health benefits.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, DOH's proposed rule is misguided, unscientific, arbitrary, and if adopted, would be unlawful. It should be rejected and withdrawn.

Summary and key scientific points

The New York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene (NYC DOHMH) is proposing to restrict the sale of sugary drinks purportedly in order to halt the rising rates of obesity. The studies they cite show that obesity is going up in the United States. They also refer to a number of studies that purport to show an association between drinking sugar-sweetened beverages (SSBs[a]) and obesity. What they fail to do is demonstrate that drinking SSBs contributes to causing or combating obesity in a unique way, unlike any other foods or beverages. Second, they ignore many recent studies indicating no relationship of SSBs to obesity. They overlook the effect of other foods and beverages, some having far more calories and which may be representative of New Yorkers' diets. They also ignore potential unintended consequences of eliminating a single food or beverage without addressing the multiple factors that interact to cause obesity in this society. NYC DOHMH has not made the case for restricting the sale of sugary drinks to combat obesity because the scientific evidence will not support its proposal. In reviewing the scientific evidence (including research not addressed by NYC DOHMH), this report emphasizes that focusing on SSBs alone cannot effectively stem or reverse the obesity epidemic.

This review substantiates the following major scientific points:

1. Obesity has been increasing since the 1960s. Scientists agree that there is no single cause of obesity. Factors include, among others, energy intake, physical activity, television watching, technological advances, more meals eaten away from home and greater consumption of foods prepared away from home, agricultural improvements, the social environment, and genetic influences.

[a] Sugar-sweetened beverages include regular soda, sports drinks, energy drinks, sweetened water, fruit drinks and presweetened coffee and tea.

2. Obesity results from caloric or energy imbalance. Consumption in excess of calories used in the routines of daily living plus physical activity create the imbalance that causes humans to store excess calories from any source as fat.
3. Since 2008, caloric intake has actually declined in the US. Nonetheless, obesity rates continue to climb. The focus on food and beverage intake addresses only half of the energy balance equation.
4. Consumption of added sugars, especially from SSBs, has declined significantly since 1999/2000 belying any causal connection to obesity.
5. Approximately half of overweight or obese people ages 2 and older drink no SSBs. A study from the University of California at Los Angeles (UCLA) found that more than half (52%) the adults who do not consume any sugar-sweetened soda are, nonetheless, either overweight or obese. According to the National Health and Nutrition Examination Survey (NHANES) data, 48% of overweight or obese individuals drink no SSBs on any given day (2009/2010), an increase from 40% in 2001/2002. Sixty-seven percent of obese individuals drink no regular soda on any given day.
6. There is no evidence that the consumption of SSBs causes obesity, and comprehensive reviews of available epidemiological studies and controlled experiments by the World Cancer Research Fund and others confirm that the consumption of beverages of any type is not associated with excess weight gain or obesity.
7. The data also show that weight gain or weight loss is due to an energy imbalance – consuming too many calories or not enough physical activity to maintain body weight. No one single food or nutrient causes weight gain, and weight loss is achieved by a reduction in calories, regardless of the source.
8. All SSBs contribute, on average, about 7% of total calories. Ninety-three percent of calories come from other sources. On average, calories from added sugars have declined in the past decade while calories from fats have risen by 20%.
9. Daily individual caloric intake has increased between 1970 and 2008 by approximately 617 calories, 560 of which are not from caloric sweeteners. Rather, pronounced increases in daily consumption of added fats and oils (213 calories), flour and cereal (193 calories), and dairy (107 calories) far outstripped the increase in consumption of all caloric sweeteners (57 calories), of which SSBs are only a relatively small segment.

Addressing consumption of only one food or beverage in isolation exposes a potential for substitution with higher-calorie alternatives. It also may discourage public acceptance of better-targeted and more efficacious public health efforts. The popularly-known 'Snackwell effect' has been shown for beverages as well.

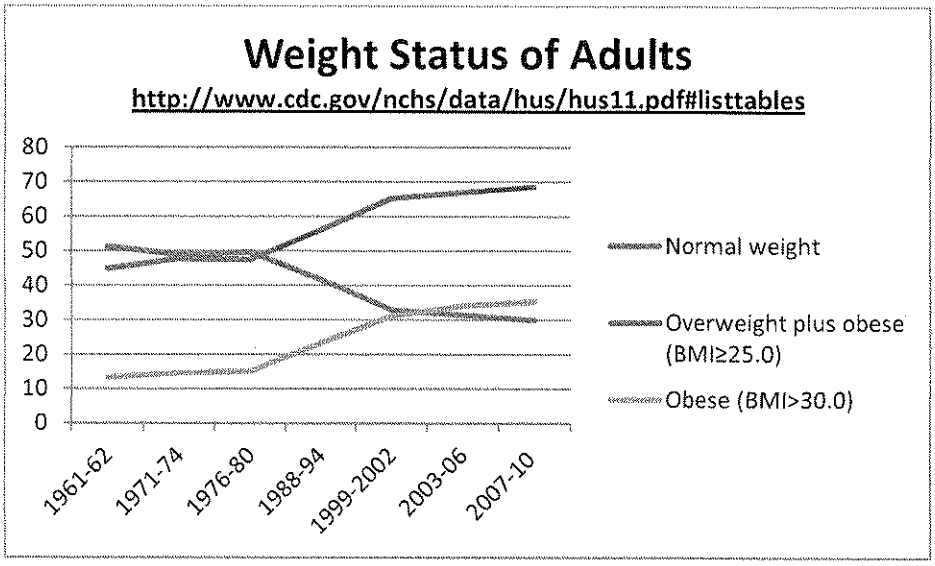
These and the other points discussed below decisively show that there is no scientific merit to the expectation that obesity will be controlled by reducing the size of SSBs sold. Calories from all sources must be reduced and coupled with more physical activity to address the challenge of obesity.

Background information on increasing obesity rates

Obesity has become one of the major health concerns in the United States. The prevalence of obesity has climbed since at least the 1960s and the pace at which it is increasing accelerated in the 1980s.[1] Sixty-eight percent of U.S. adults are overweight or obese[2]; more than one-third of adults are obese[3]. Obesity is a significant health problem that requires broad public and private efforts to combat.

The following graph reflects the latest data from the Centers for Disease Control (CDC)[4] showing that, among adults in the United States, overweight and obesity increased from 44.8 percent in 1960/1962 to 68.5 percent in 2007/2010.

From this graph, it is apparent that the rate of increase in overweight and obesity has slowed since 1999/2002, but has not declined.



Rates of obesity among children also continue to climb, as the following graph (Figure 1) depicts.

SOURCE: CDC/NCHS, Health, United States, 2011, Figure 10. Data from the National Health and Nutrition Examination Survey.

The most common standard for obesity in adults is Body Mass Index or BMI, which relates body weight to height in a single number. [BMI = weight (kg)/height (m^2)]. A BMI between 18.5 and 24.9 is defined as 'normal weight'; BMI of 25.0 to 29.9 is 'overweight' and BMI equal to or greater than 30.0 is 'obese'. The Centers for Disease Control has an online calculator for determining one's BMI (http://www.cdc.gov/healthyweight/assessing/bmi/adult_bmi/english_bmi_calculator/bmi_calculator.html). In children, CDC defines a BMI greater than the 85th percentile of weight for a given age as overweight; a BMI-for-age greater than the 95th percentile is defined as obese.

There is no single cause of obesity

Scientists are in agreement that there is no single cause of obesity and that obesity is not caused by any specific source of calories. Arguments proliferate for genetic, environmental, technological, sociological, agricultural or other causes. Regardless of the precedents and interactions, however, obesity results from an excess of caloric intake over expenditure. The imbalance that leads to obesity can come from any and all caloric sources, including carbohydrates, fats, proteins, and alcohol (ethanol). In fact, one study even pointed to dietary variety itself as a cause of body fatness.[5] The Academy of Nutrition and Dietetics' position statement on weight management[6] does not specify any particular food or nutrient group either to emphasize or to prevent weight gain. The Dietary Guidelines for Americans 2010, a joint effort by the U.S. Departments of Agriculture and Health and Human Services, takes this advice a step further: "To manage body weight, Americans should consume a diet that has an appropriate total number of calories and that is within the Acceptable Macronutrient Distribution Range (AMDR). Strong evidence shows that there is no optimal proportion of macronutrients that can facilitate weight loss or assist with maintaining weight loss."[7] While the Dietary Guidelines do identify various food and beverage choices that can be made to help bring energy intake in line with energy expenditure, the Dietary Guidelines do not single out any one food or beverage category as the key to weight loss, just as they do not dictate any single form of physical exercise. In short, the Dietary Guidelines advise Americans to control weight by increasing physical activity and consuming fewer calories.[8]

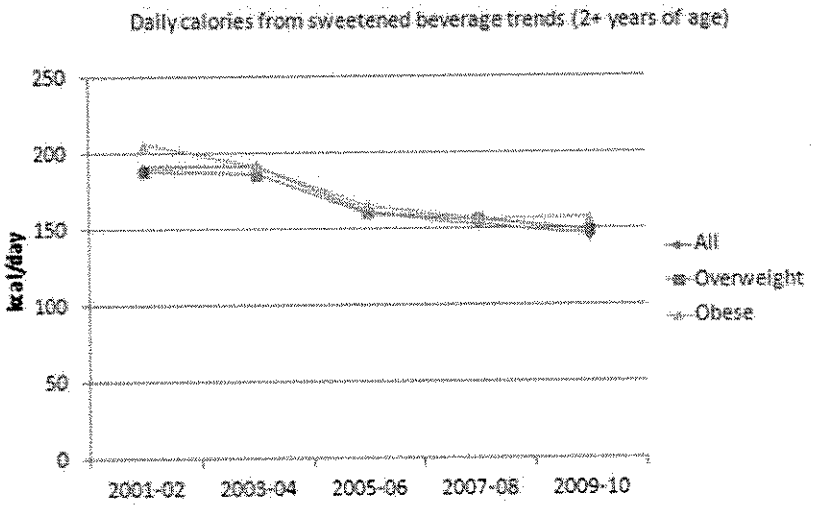
Every macronutrient can contribute to obesity. This includes fat, carbohydrate, and protein[9]. As Roberta Larson Duyff put it in the classic nutrition text by the American Dietetic Association, "Be aware that no matter what their source – carbohydrates, fats, or proteins – your body stores most excess calories you consume as body fat." There is no calorie-producing nutrient that has escaped study demonstrating its role in producing weight gain or causing obesity. Surprising to many people, gram for gram, carbohydrate – including sugar – has the same calorie value as protein.

Calories from SSBs have significantly decreased in the past decade and do not correlate with increasing obesity rates

The government has tracked 'added sugars' intake since 1999/2000[b]. Between 1999-2000 and 2007-2008, intake of added sugars decreased from 100.1 grams per day to 76.7 grams per day, a decline of 24 percent[10]. Two-thirds of this decline came from decreased soda consumption. This decline occurred among children and youths as well as adults. For example, among adolescents 12-17 years of age, sugared beverages fell from nearly 13 percent to 9.1 percent of daily calories.

In addition, consumption of SSBs has significantly declined ($p<0.0001$) from 2001/2002 to 2009/2010 according to an analysis of NHANES consumption figures[11]. Note that these declines occur among the overweight and obese as well as normal weight individuals.

[b] 'Added sugars' are defined as caloric sweeteners that are consumed separately – as sugar in coffee or tea – or added during processing or preparation. The human body is unable to differentiate sugars added during processing or manufacture from those that are an inherent part of the food. Schorin MD, Sollid K, Smith-Edge M, Bouchoux A. The Science of Sugars, Part 1. Nutr Today. 2012;47:96-101.



Significant decrease in all subjects (beta coefficient and p-value of -12.9, p<0.0001, respectively), those overweight (-10.8, p=0.0001) , respectively) and those obese (-13.0, p<0.0001) (Fulgoni – Personal communication 07/12)

The reduction in SSB intake in the face of increasing obesity rates belies the view that SSBs cause obesity or fuel the growth of Americans' girth. The following graph dramatically shows the opposing trends of obesity and SSB consumption. Obesity prevalence continues to rise despite steep declines in sugars from SSBs since the turn of the century.

In fact, SSBs represent only a small fraction of total caloric intake. According to an analysis by the Dietary Guidelines Advisory Committee (2010), intake of 'regular soda/energy/sports drinks' comprise 114 out of 2,157 calories Americans consume on average. [12] This represents only 5% of total calories. (When all sweetened beverages are included, the figure rises to between 6.2 and 7.2 %.) The remaining 93 to 94 percent of calories come from other foods and beverages.

Calories from other sources have been growing at a faster rate, many other foods and beverages have higher calorie contents and are served in larger portions than SSBs Consumption of many foods has increased in the past 40 years. The Dietary Guidelines for Americans (DGAC) Advisory Committee[13] examined the changes. Americans consumed 617 more calories per day in 2008 than they did in 1970. Of those 617 more calories, 560 calories—or nearly 91% of the increase—are not from caloric sweeteners, of which SSBs are only a small segment. Indeed, the data show that SSB consumption has decreased over the past decade[c].

[c] Caloric sweeteners are similar to 'added sugars'. The term is used by USDA to track the availability of various commodities.

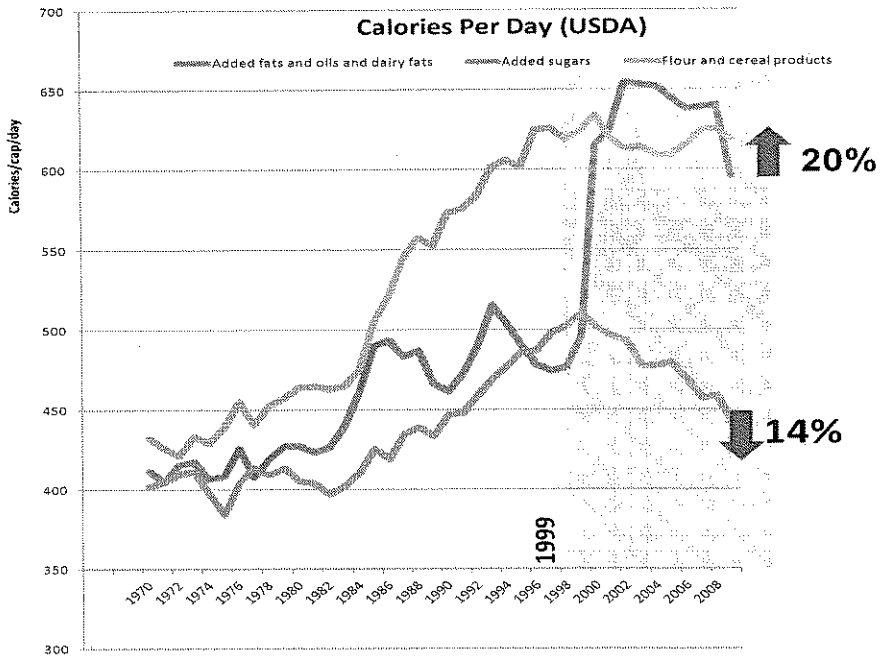
Table 2. Calories available in 1970, 1990, 2008 according to USDA ERS

	Calories Consumed
Year	1970	1990	2008	Change
Added fats and oils	403	446	616	213
Flour and cereal products	432	573	625	193
Dairy	155	260	257	107
Caloric sweeteners	402	446	459	57
Meat, eggs, and nuts	463	453	482	19
Other dairy fats	6	15	25	16
Fruits	71	85	87	16
Vegetables	125	126	122	-3

Table 2[14] shows that calories available from all food groups except vegetables have increased since 1970. The greatest increase comes from flour and cereal products, which grew by 45 percent. Caloric sweeteners increased 14 percent during that period.

As the following graph shows, since 1999 Americans have increased their consumption of fats and oils by 20% (Figure 5). In that same period, added sugars have gone down by nearly 14%. Analysis of NHANES data confirms the continued decline in added sugars consumption from 1999/2000 through 2009/2010.[15]



Additionally, SSBs (defined as soda, energy, sports drinks, and sweetened water) are not the greatest source of calories in the diet. The 2010 Dietary Guidelines Advisory Group ranked intake of various foods. Grain-based desserts were the largest contributor to the diet followed by yeast breads, chicken and chicken mixed dishes, soda/energy/sports drinks and pizza.

There is a difference between availability (gleaned from agriculture data) and consumption (obtained by asking people what they have eaten). USDA's Economic Research Service attempted to reconcile differences by adjusting for spoilage and waste, although there will never be a complete match. The greatest contributor and the most difficult to calculate is the spoilage and waste that occurs at home, not during manufacture or transport.

A critical point, not addressed by DOHMH, is that portion sizes of many different foods have increased over the years. As noted in an education module distributed by the National Heart Lung and Blood Institute (NHLBI[16]), portion sizes have shifted over time with many commonly consumed foods:

Food	'20 years ago' calories and size	'Today'- calories and size
Muffin	210 calories in 1.5 oz	500 calories in 4 oz
Coffee	45 calories in 8 oz	350 calories in 16 oz
Pepperoni pizza	500 calories in 2 slices	850 calories in 2 slices
Chicken Caesar Salad	390 calories in 1.5 cups	790 calories in 3.5 cups
Popcorn	270 calories in 5 cups	630 calories in 11 cups
Cheesecake	260 calories in 3 oz wedge	640 calories in 7 oz wedge
Chicken Stir-fry	435 calories in 2 cups	865 calories in 4.5 cups

Table 3. Changes in portion sizes of food cited in NHLBI educational presentation.

Therefore, some people consume larger portions of many different foods and beverages. No one particular food or beverage is tied to weight gain and obesity. The challenge is to reduce surplus calories, whether they come from cheesecake, chips, or chicken.

Figure 6 below compares the calories for a number of commonly-consumed foods and beverages. It shows that a 16 fl. oz. cola has fewer calories than a bagel or a 16 fl. oz. 'Grande' mocha coffee from Starbuck's®. New Yorkers' beloved corned beef sandwich has more than five times the calories of a 16-oz soft drink. A bagel and cream cheese has more than twice the calories.

Figure 7, labeled 'Beverage Calories per Ounce,' shows the detailed calories for numerous beverages. Note that calories for beer are equal to those in a soft drink. Mixed drinks, milk shakes and wine exceed calories per ounce of sugar-sweetened drinks the NYC Department of Health and Mental Hygiene proposes to regulate. Even 100% orange juice packs a bigger caloric punch than a cola when compared this way.

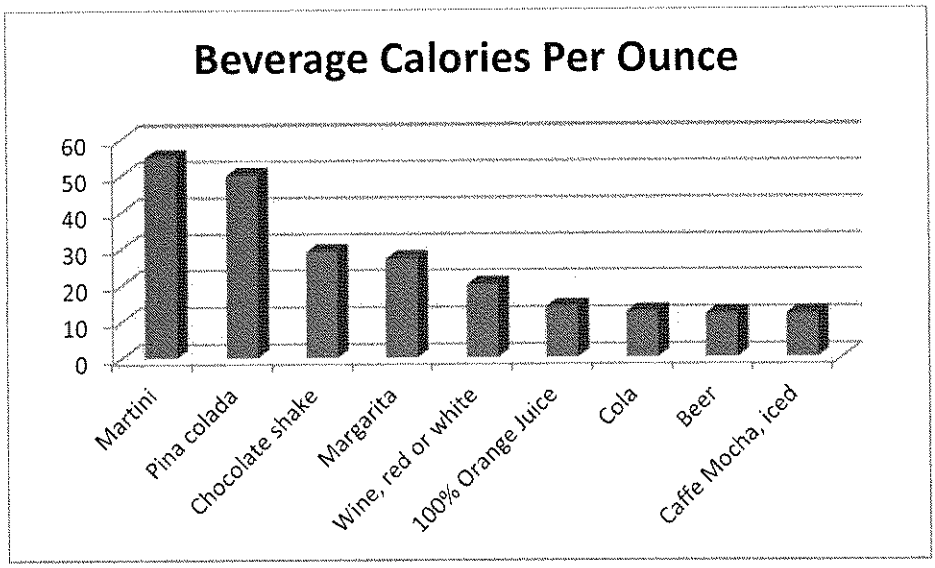

Figure 7. Ounce for ounce, colas have the same calories as beer, but fewer than many mixed alcoholic drinks, wine, or 100% fruit juice.

Recent studies and NHANES data do not support the contention that consumption of SSBs is a unique driver of obesity rates

The most recent NHANES data, 2009/2010, reveal that 47%[17] of Americans reported drinking no SSBs during the 2-day dietary recall. Two out of three (67%) report drinking no regular soda during the 2-day recall. Among overweight and obese individuals, 46% (or nearly half) reported drinking no SSBs. Of those obese individuals who did report drinking SSBs, 76.5% reported drinking fewer than 16 ounces per day. Clearly, it is imperative to look at the total diet and not merely SSBs to understand and combat obesity. Additional information concerning trends in NHANES data is provided in the separate report prepared by Dr. Fulgoni.

A UCLA survey[18] found that adults who drink a soda or more a day are 27% more likely to be overweight than those who drink no soda. But surprising facts are buried in the report. Only one out of four California adults consumes one or more sodas per day, yet 56.1 percent of the population is overweight. That means that three-quarters of adults drink no soda or less than one a day. This survey also found that 52% of adults who do not drink any sugar-sweetened sodas are either overweight or obese. This confirms the conclusion that other foods and beverages make people overweight or obese.

In addition, the World Cancer Research Fund (WCRF) supported a comprehensive review of the epidemiological evidence examining the association between various food and food groups, physical activity and obesity. The 2009 publication concluded that the consumption of beverages of any type is not associated with excess weight gain or obesity.[19]

Another investigative group led by Richard Mattes of Purdue University and David Allison of University of Alabama[20] performed a systematic review and meta-analysis of randomized controlled experiments to understand the relationship between nutritively-sweetened beverage consumption and body weight. Of the twelve studies that met their criteria, these internationally-renowned obesity researchers did not find evidence either that nutritively-sweetened beverages were unique contributors to obesity or that reducing consumption of such beverages will reduce body mass index[21]. They wrote, "Meta-analysis of studies that attempted to reduce NSB (nutritively-sweetened beverage) consumption consistently showed no effect on BMI when all subjects were considered." Thus, neither epidemiological nor experimental evidence permits the conclusion that SSBs cause obesity or that reducing SSB consumption would decrease BMI.

Several other recent studies demonstrated similar results in children. In 2012 Danyliw[22] et al. examined beverage consumption patterns among Canadian children. They found no relationship between soft drink intake and obesity in four of five age-gender groups. A relationship was observed among 6-11 year old boys, but not girls; nor was there a relationship in 2-5 year olds or in 12-18 year-old girls or boys.

Comparing overweight prevalence among children and youths in 34 countries and associated food and behavioral factors, Janssen and his colleagues[23] found no relationship between overweight and intake of fruits, vegetables, soft drinks or time spent on the computer. However, they found lower physical activity levels and more television viewing associated with overweight. Their conclusion: "Increasing physical activity participation and decreasing television viewing should be the focus of strategies aimed at preventing and treating overweight and obesity in youth."

Contrary to the lack of a relationship between soft drinks and obesity, a study of milk consumption[24] involving more than 12,000 children found that those who drank the most milk gained more weight than those who drank less. This finding held even when the children drank 1% or skim milk. This reinforces the well-established premise that all calories count. Weight gain occurs in the presence of excess calories, regardless of whether they come from milk, cookies or SSBs.

It is critical that Americans, especially children, consume a balanced diet to ensure adequate vitamin, mineral and macronutrient intake for growth and health maintenance. Some foods and beverages contribute nutrients plus calories; others are consumed for refreshment and enjoyment. However, beyond a balanced diet, any excess calories, regardless of the food or beverage source, will contribute to obesity. The derogatory term, 'empty calories', often applied to some SSBs denies the pleasurable effects such beverages may convey. In the context of obesity, 'surplus calories' has more impact and relevance than so-called empty calories.

The "Snackwell Effect"

Unintended adverse consequences pose an additional concern about attempting to influence overall obesity rates by reducing one food or nutrient. In the late 1970s, concerns about cholesterol and fat intake led the Surgeon General to encourage people to eat a lower-fat diet[25]. Food manufacturers responded by creating a host of no- and low-fat options (similar to the current flood of gluten-free products). Nabisco introduced a line of zero-fat cookies named 'Snackwell.' The public enthusiastically ate Snackwells, ignoring that the cookies, although fat-free, still had as many calories as regular cookies. In fact, consumers ate more cookies than if they were not fat-free. Obesity rates continued to climb. This unintended consequence of arbitrarily restricting one nutrient without considering total dietary intake has been dubbed the Snackwell effect.[26]

Regulatory actions focusing solely on SSBs may unintentionally result in a paradoxical increase in caloric intake. Indeed, Brian Wansink, former Director of USDA's Center for Nutrition Policy and Promotion and consumer behavior professor at Cornell University (author of the best-selling book Mindless Eating), and colleagues published a study showing just that effect.[27] They found that, over several months, a tax on sugar-sweetened soft drinks did not cause consumers to purchase more diet sodas. Frequent soft drink purchasers consumed 450 additional calories from sweetened fruit juice, although they also purchased more water. In households that purchased beer, the tax led to increased beer consumption. These and other studies challenge the New York Department of Health's apparent but unproven view that simply cutting SSB consumption will reduce obesity or halt its increase.

Just as calories from any source can contribute to weight gain and cause obesity, changing the energy balance equation to eat fewer calories than expended is the key to weight loss, not reducing or eliminating any single item in the diet.

Founded by Dr. James Hill of the University of Colorado and Dr. Rena Wing of Brown University, the National Weight Control Registry tracks success at weight loss. Registry members have lost an average of 66 pounds and kept it off for 5.5 years. Registry[28] members employ a wide variety of techniques and diets to lose the weight. They use commercial programs, their own techniques, liquid or food diets or even surgery to lose weight. No single diet or procedure is predominant or predictive of success. However, investigators report that Registry members all maintain "their weight losses similarly by eating a low calorie diet." The success of these weight losers validates the concept that any change in the energy balance equation that favors burning more calories than are consumed can lead to significant weight loss.

Researchers at the Harvard School of Public Health[29] and other institutions conducted a clinical trial to determine which type of diet works the best to promote weight loss. They compared high-carbohydrate, high-fat, and balanced macronutrient diets over a two-year period. Their conclusion: every diet can reduce body weight as long as calories are reduced, regardless of which macronutrients were emphasized.

Conclusion

The data clearly show that obesity is a significant problem in the United States and is not disappearing. However, calories from SSBs have been declining while obesity rates continue to climb. Intake of other foods and beverages (except vegetables) has been increasing, and many are served in larger portions and have much higher calorie content than SSBs. SSBs do not uniquely cause or contribute to the problem of weight gain. The decade-long decline in SSB consumption in the face of growing obesity prevalence shows the opposite.

Making public policy decisions based upon faulty science will not generate the desired result of weight loss or obesity prevention. The need for caloric reduction and rebalance of energy control is clearly necessary to prevent further exacerbating the obesity epidemic. Reducing or eliminating a single food or beverage category, as has been proposed by the NY DOHMH, will not accomplish that goal.

Thank you for considering these comments during your deliberations.

I am the Senior Vice President of Nutrition Impact, LLC. I received a PhD in Animal Science with an emphasis in nutrition and a minor in statistics from the University of Tennessee, a MS degree in Animal Science also from the University of Tennessee, and a BS degree in Animal Science from Rutgers University. I worked in the food industry at the Kellogg Company for over 15 years with positions in statistics, chemistry and nutrition. I left Kellogg in 1999 as Vice President of Food and Nutrition Research to start Nutrition Impact, LLC. Nutrition Impact, LLC is a food and nutrition consulting company that helps clients develop science-based messages concerning their products and services. Nutrition Impact, LLC was intimately involved in filings with the U.S. Food and Drug Administration that resulted in three new health and nutrition claims, namely plant sterol esters reducing heart disease, potassium reducing the risk of stroke, and claims regarding choline, the first new nutrient content claim in almost ten years. Nutrition Impact, LLC also performs analyses of government food, nutrition, and health databases like the National Health and Nutrition Examination Surveys (NHANES) for clients evaluating the contribution certain food and beverage products (e.g., dairy products, bean and bean products, 100% juices, etc.) make to nutrient intake and their effect on certain health parameters. Recently, Nutrition Impact has worked with the Nutrient Rich Foods Coalition helping to develop and validate various approaches to a nutrient density scoring system for foods. I have also authored numerous scientific papers that were published in leading nutrition journals (see attached CV for further details).

Methodology

For this particular project Nutrition Impact, LLC, and myself in particular, were asked to analyze NHANES data to examine 1) trends in excess weight or obesity for children and adults; 2) trends in consumption of calorically sweetened soda (referred to herein as "regular soda"), sugar sweetened beverages (SSB) and other food energy sources; 3) usual daily intake data for regular sodas and other SSB with an assessment of percentage of various population groups consuming more or less than 16 ounces/day; 4) usual consumption for regular sodas and other SSB with an assessment of percentage of various population groups consuming more or less than 16 ounces/day; and 5) the percentages of children and adults who drink no regular sodas who are overweight or obese.

Since the information provided in this comment are new primary data, more details on the specifics of the analyses seems appropriate.

Trends in overweight and obesity. Using NHANES, 2001-2010, trends in percentages of population overweight and/or obese was determined. For adults, BMI≥25 but BMI<30, BMI≥30, and BMI ≥25 were used as definition of overweight, obese, and overweight/obese, respectively. In children, the Center for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) percentiles for BMI for age were used to assess overweight and/or obesity; BMI for age $\geq 85^{th}$ percentile but $<95^{th}$ percentile, BMI for age $\geq 95^{th}$ percentile, and BMI for age $\geq 85^{th}$ percentile, represented overweight, obese, and overweight/obese, respectively.

Trends in sources of calories in the diet. Using NHANES, 2001-2010, trends in sources of calories in American diets were determined. Food groups were those provided by USDA in their food coding scheme for NHANES. Foods were grouped by first two digits of USDA food code providing about 50 different categories of foods/beverages. Specific listing of the USDA food coding system is in the documentation for various Food and Nutrient Database for Dietary Studies (FNDDS) available on line (http://www.ars.usda.gov/Services/docs.htm?docid=12089). This allows assessment of contribution from main food groups (e.g., fruits, vegetables, grains, etc) and from certain sub-groups (e.g., dried fruit, legumes, cold cereals, cooked cereals, etc.) of foods and beverages.

Usual consumption of regular soda and SSB. Usual intake per consumption event in g/day and calories/day of regular soda and SSB [defined as regular sodas, fruitades, fruit drinks, and sports drinks, coffee and tea (pre-sweetened), and sweetened energy drinks] was determined. With usual intake of consumption event distributions established, we then assessed the percentage of the population with consumption intakes more/less than 16 ounces per day.

Usual daily intake of regular soda and SSB. Usual intake, a measure of long term intake, in g/day and calories/day of/from regular soda and SSB [defined as regular sodas, fruitades, fruit drinks, and sports drinks, coffee and tea (pre-sweetened), and sweetened energy drinks] was determined. With usual intake distributions established, we then assessed the percentage of the population with daily intakes more/less than 16 ounces per day.

Usual intake was determined using sophisticated programming steps made publicly available by the National Cancer Institute (NCI) (available at: http://www.riskfactor.cancer.gov/diet/usualintakes/pop/. While these programs are complex, we have been using them for several years and have published results in leading peer-reviewed nutrition journals. As is typical for these analyses, several covariates were used in the usual intake models: 1) day of week of dietary recall dichotomized into weekday and weekend (Friday through Sunday); 2) first or second dietary recall; and 3) age. Mean usual intake and percentiles (10^{th}, 25^{th}, 50^{th}, 75^{th}, and 90^{th}) of usual intake were determined. We also examined the percentage of the population that had intakes more/less than 16 ounces/day.

Percentage of the population consuming regular soda and SSB. The percentage of various population groups consuming regular soda and SSB as defined above was also determined. The population groups of interest were all subjects, all adults, all children, adult subjects with BMI <25 (i.e., "normal weight"), adult subjects with BMI≥ 25 but BMI<30 (i.e., overweight), adult subjects with BMI≥ 30 (i.e., obese), children with BMI for age $<85^{th}$ percentile (i.e., "normal weight"), children with BMI for age $\geq 85^{th}$ percentile but $<95^{th}$ percentile (i.e., overweight), and children BMI for age $\geq 95^{th}$ percentile (i.e., obese). NHANES single 24 hour recall data were used to assess percentage consuming regular soda and SSB trends on any given day.

Data were generated for each section above for one or more of the the following sub-populations:

- Total population 2+, 2-19, and 20+ years of age
- Population 20+ years separated by weight status (BMI< 25, BMI≥25 but BMI<30, BMI≥30, and BMI ≥25 representing normal weight, overweight, obese, and overweight/obese, respectively)
- Population 2-19 years separated by weight status BMI for age <85th percentile, BMI for age ≥85th percentile but <95th percentile, BMI for age ≥95th percentile, and BMI for age ≥85th percentile, representing normal weight, overweight, obese, and overweight/obese, respectively)

All analyses were determined for NHANES 2001-2010 collectively and for each two year cycle of NHANES (i.e., 2001-2002, 2003-2004, 2005-2006, 2007-2008, and 2009-2010). A p-for-trend for changes over time, namely the five cycles of NHANES, were assessed; a p-value of <0.05 was deemed significant. NHANES 2009-2010 data were used as the most current information.

Sample-weighted data were used in all statistical analyses, and all analyses were performed using SAS Release 9.2 (SAS Institute, Cary, NC)/SUDAAN Release 10.0 (RTI International, Research Triangle Park, NC) to adjust the variance for the clustered sample design, thus results are representative of the US population.

We also were asked to analyze data specify to New York City (NYC), namely the Youth Risk Behavior Survey (YBRS). While there appear to be multiple years available for the YRBS, unfortunately we were not able to download all these data (the URLs did not appear to function correctly) and thus we could only access the data for 2009. Our analyses of the YRBS focused on examining the number of drinks by weight status. For analyses of YRBS we used SAS/SUDAAN as mentioned above for NHANES analyses and we used sample weights provided with the specific surveys to ensure analyses representative of NYC population.

Summary:

Based on my review of the NHANES data from 2001-2010, which includes the most recent NHANES data made available just last month, a number of trends are apparent that question several of the assumptions made by the New York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene in its Statement of Basis and Purpose. First, the consumption of all SSB has declined over this period, as has the consumption of regular soda. This has lead to a significant drop in calories from these beverages over the past decade while certain other sources of calories (e.g., grain mixtures like pizza) have not declined. Second, more than two-thirds of the population on any given day report to drink no regular soda; almost two-thirds of overweight and obese subjects also report no regular soda consumption on any given day. Third, using total daily usual intake, a measure of long term intake, over 80% of the population does not consume >16 ounces of regular soda per day and about two-thirds of the population has total daily usual intake of SSB less than 16 ounces/day. Fourth, in obese subjects, about 52% report to consume SSB and only about 34% report consuming regular soda. When we factor in usual consumption intake we conclude that less than a quarter of the obese population have SSB intake above 16 ounces and that only about 20% of the obese population have intake of regular soda above 16 ounces. Lastly, even the NYC data in children suggest very small differences in SSB and soda consumption based on weight status.

Discussion:

Analyses of the NHANES, 2001-2010

In children (aged 2-19 years), while there was a slight inverse trend for percentage overweight (regression coefficient of -0.32) and a slight positive trend (regression coefficient -0.32) for percentage obesity in NHANES from 2001-2010 (Figure 1), neither trend was significant ($p>0.05$). Further information provided in tables of the Appendix.

No change over time with beta coefficient and p-value for percentage overweight of -0.32 p=0.1721 and percentage obese of 0.32, p=0.3517

No change over time in overweight but an increase in obesity over time with beta coefficient and p-value for percentage of population overweight of -0.37, p=0.3397 and percentage of population obese of 1.30, p=0.0006

Calories from SSB consumption has continued to decline among all groups (Figure 3), with a reduction of over 20% in caloric intake of SSB between 2001 and 2010. Calories from regular soda consumption has been declining even more dramatically (Figure 4), with a reduction of over 35% in calories from sweetened soda between 2001 and 2010. Since we saw similar trends in adults (20+ years of age) and in children (2-19 years of age) for figures in this comment we present data for all subjects 2+ years of age. In the Appendix we provide data in the figures for all subjects as well as data separately for adults and children.

Significant decrease in all subjects (beta coefficient and p-value of -13.1, p<0.0001, respectively), those overweight (-12.6, p<0.0001), respectively) and those obese (-12.3, p<0.0001)

While SSB, and in particular regular soda, contribution to caloric intake has decreased from 2001-2002 to 2009-2010, there are other foods/food groups that remain a significant source of calories to the diet (Figure 5). Grain mixtures (pizza, tacos, burritos and other foods that combine numerous ingredients but are predominantly grains), is the number one source of calories in the US diet and has remained so over the last 10 years. Pizza, just one food in the broad category of grain mixtures, now provides more calories to the US diet than regular soda. Of the food/food groups provided in Figure 5 only calorie contribution from nonalcoholic beverages and regular soda to the US diet has decreased significantly ($p<0.05$) over the time period studied. A listing of all foods and their contribution to the US diet are provided in the Appendix.

The NHANES data show that SSB and regular soda usage—i.e., the percentage of the population that drink any SSB/ regular soda whatsoever on any given day—has fallen substantially over the last decade. In 2001-2002, approximately 41% of obese subjects reportedly drank no SSB and in 2009-2010, about 48% of obese people drink no SSB at all (Figure 6). Additionally, in 2001-2002, approximately 56% of obese subjects reportedly drank no regular soda, and in 2009-2010, 66% of obese people drink no regular soda at all (Figure 7). The trends are similar for children and adults (data provided in Appendix).

Figure7. Trends in Regular Soda Usage (2+ years of age) – NHANES 2001-2010

Significant decrease in all subjects (beta coefficient and p-value of -3.2, p<0.0001, respectively), those overweight (-3.2, p<0.0001), respectively) and those obese (-2.8, p<0.0001)

Using total daily usual intake data from NHANES (using two days of dietary recalls and the NCI programs to generate longer term estimates of intake), there has been a significant increase in the percentage of the population that consumed less than 16 ounces/day from 2001-2002 as compared to 2009-2010 (Figure 8). For example, for all subjects (2+ years of age) in 2001-2002, 52.8% of the population had daily usual intake of SSB < 16 ounces/day while in 2009-2010 the percentage was 67.6% of the population. Similar increases in percentage of the population with total daily intake of SSB < 16 ounces were seen in children and adults.

Data Source: NHANES
Percentages with different superscripts within age groups are significantly different, p<0.0001

Similarly, there was an increase in the percentage of the population having total usual daily intake of regular soda < 16 ounces per day (Figure 9); in 2001-2002 about 71% of the population had daily usual intake < 16 ounces and the percentage increased to 85.3% in 2009-2010.

The most recent NHANES data, 2009/2010 reveal that on any given day 47% of Americans reported no SSB consumption (last data point in Figure 6 inverted to represent non-consumption). Among overweight and obese individuals, about 49% or nearly half reportedly drink no SSB. We determined the distribution of usual intake of consumptions of SSB and regular soda (these data were generated with the NCI programs using each beverage consumption by each subject on each day of dietary recall as initial data points). Combining the percentage of the obese population consuming a SSB or regular soda with the percentage of that population with consumptions greater than 16 ounces allows us to assess the percentage of the obese population that exceeds 16 ounces of consumption of SSB or regular soda. For SSB, less than a quarter (23.5%) of the obese population has consumption of SSB greater than 16 ounces (Figure 10).

Using the same approach for regular soda (with only 34.2% of the obese population currently consuming regular soda on any given day), we conclude that only 15.1% of the obese population has regular soda consumption of greater than 16 ounces (Figure 11)

Analyses of the NYC YRBS data

While the methodologies employed by NHANES and NYC to collect their data were different than NHANES, the NYC data analyses does provide some interesting findings. For example, in NYC youth the average number of drinks per day of SSB and regular soda is similar across weight status, e.g., obese children have similar intake as normal weight children (Figure 12).

APPENDIX C

Written Statement of Dr. Howard Ory
Prepared in Opposition to New York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene Proposed Rule No. 2012 RG 047 Establishing Maximum Beverage Sizes in Food Service Establishments

Introduction

I am Dr. Howard Ory. I received my MD degree from Tufts University Medical School in 1969 and joined the U.S. Centers for Disease Control in 1971. I received a Masters Degree in Epidemiology from the Harvard University School of Public Health in 1974. I worked at the CDC as a practicing epidemiologist for twenty-three years until my retirement in 1994. While at the CDC, I held various management positions including Deputy Director for Epidemiology. Over the course of my career, I have conducted multiple large-scale epidemiologic studies involving numerous diseases. The focus of much of that research was to determine the safety of, for example, common medical practices and medications and to consider potential warnings. Over the course of my career, I have consulted on numerous public health issues for the CDC as well as other public health agencies such as the World Health Organization and the Food and Drug Administration. After retiring from the CDC, I was a Vice President for Health Care Research at Prudential Healthcare. I left there at the end of 1996, and since then I have been a private consultant in epidemiology. I have published more than 100 scientific articles in peer-reviewed publications on a wide range of subjects. My full resume is attached.

Purpose and Summary of Testimony

I am submitting this statement on behalf of the American Beverage Association to address Proposed Rule No. 2012 RG 047 which would, if enacted, restrict the size of "sugary drinks" sold in specified food service establishments to 16 ounces or less. The proposed rule is based on the claim that sugar sweetened beverages (SSB) are a "leading driver" of the obesity epidemic in the U.S. and that restricting the serving size of such drinks will impact the rates of overweight and obesity in New York City. I have been asked to review the scientific basis for the rule contained in the Department of Health's Statement of Basis and Purpose and Briefing Document.

In my opinion, the proposed legislation is unnecessary and not based on sound science. The data as a whole suggest that the cause of the obesity epidemic in the United States is complex and not fully understood. This is in large part due to the multiple known and unknown factors that affect weight gain and loss. Nonetheless, the data convincingly shows that SSBs and "added sugars" are not the driving force behind the current obesity epidemic. To the contrary, the data suggest that:

- SSB consumption has been decreasing in the U.S. since 1998 without a corresponding decrease in the rates of overweight and obese. As of 2008, only 50% of people in the U.S. consume SSBs, and that number appears to be declining.

- SSB consumption plays a relatively small role in weight and energy balance over the long-term, compared to the overall contribution of other caloric foods and the effect of factors such as physical inactivity.

- Considering the population as a whole, most of the weight gain occurs in people who consume little or no SSBs.

- A number of studies show little difference in the average Body Mass Index (BMI)[1] levels in populations with high and low consumption of SSBs. In addition, studies show that the mean annual weight gain in persons consistently consuming high levels of SSBs is very similar to the weight gain in people consistently consuming low levels.[2]

- SSBs have not strongly or consistently been associated with diabetes or heart disease so there is no basis to conclude that consumption of SSBs causes either disease.

For these and other reasons discussed in detail below, the scientific evidence does not support the conclusion that SSBs are a "leading driver" of the obesity epidemic or that SSBs cause type II diabetes or heart disease.

1. The Department of Health overstates the amount of sugar sweetened beverage consumption and its impact on the average American's diet.

The Department of Health cites of a number of statistics in support of the claim that the rise in overweight and obesity has followed a rise in the amount of sugar sweetened beverages (SSBs) consumed in the U.S. The Department, for example, cites the statistic that "Americans consume 200 – 300 more calories daily than 30 years ago, with the largest single increase due to sugary drinks," as well as number of statistics regarding increasing portion size.

The Department presents an incomplete and therefore misleading picture of SSB consumption, and particularly consumption of full-calorie carbonated soft drinks in the U.S. Data from the U.S. Centers for Disease Control's National Health and Nutrition Examination Survey (NHANES) demonstrate that while SSB consumption increased between 1978 and 1998, it decreased for the next 10 years from 1998 to 2008. The overall intake of added sugars declined by 24% during this period, and two-thirds of the decrease in added sugar intake resulted from a reduction of sugar consumed in soda.[3] Welsh, et al., state that "[c]learly, the decrease in added sugars has been driven by a reduction in soda consumption."[4]

In 1999, SSBs accounted for 9.3% of the total energy consumed by children and adults which was reduced to 6.6% in 2008.[5] As of 2008, 50% of the population did not drink SSBs at all, and that figure appears to be increasing.[6]

The CDC also has published data from the 2010 National Youth Physical Activity and Nutrition Study (NYPANS), which measured dietary behaviors among a nationally representative sample of students in grades 9 – 12.[7] The study asked about consumption of SSBs in the seven days immediately before the survey. Only 24.3% of high school students reported drinking a serving of regular soda or pop during that period, and only 15.6% of students reported drinking soda two or more times per day. When all SSBs (soda, sports drinks, other sugar sweetened beverages) were combined, only 32.9% of the students reported drinking any combination of these beverages two or more times per day. In other words, almost 70% of high school students reported drinking 1 or less SSB per day.

Thus, while there continues to be substantial consumption of SSBs in the United States, the statement that consumption of those beverages has increased over the last 30 years is inaccurate and fails to account for a significant downward trend in consumption beginning around 1998.

A similar but larger trend, particularly in children and adolescents, has been reported in Australia, where obesity rates also have increased dramatically since 1980, while both sugar and soft drink consumption has declined. Over the period 1980 to 2003, Australia experienced a 3-fold increase in obesity while consumption of total nutritive sweeteners fell 16%. As the authors concluded, this data "challenge[s] the implicit assumption that taxes and other measures to reduce intake of soft drink will be an effective strategy in global efforts to reduce obesity."[8]

2. The scientific evidence does not support the conclusion that drinking sugar sweetened beverages is a leading driver of the obesity epidemic.

The claim that SSBs are a "leading driver" of the obesity epidemic is not supported by the available scientific evidence. A number of factors important to the analysis of the relationship between SSBs and obesity are not considered in the limited number of papers cited by the Department, and even those papers contain data that do support this conclusion.

First, as discussed above, SSB consumption (and overall sugar consumption) has decreased substantially in the last 10 years, but rates of overweight and obesity over that same period have continued to increase or remain stable.[9] Although this data is ecologic,[10] it strongly suggests that the driving force behind obesity is something other than sugary drink consumption.

Second, studies suggest that, considering the population as a whole, most of the weight gain occurs in people who consume little or no SSBs. For example, in Schulze et al. 2004, one of the studies cited by the Department, during a four-year period, the portion of the study population that gained weight while consistently consuming one serving or less per week of SSBs was 38,737 women. In contrast, however, the portion of the study population that gained the same amount of weight while consistently consuming one serving or more per day was just 2,366 women.[11] Thus, there were sixteen times as many women who gained weight while infrequently consuming SSBs as there were women who gained weight while frequently consuming SSBs. It is also important to note that these two groups gained the same amount of weight. Data presented in the Black Women Health Study showed similar results.[12]

Third, a number of cross-sectional studies show little difference in mean Body Mass Index (BMI)[13] levels in populations with high and low consumption of SSBs. For example, in Schulze 2004, the women who consistently consumed less than one SSB per week had an average BMI of 24.3 whereas those who consistently consumed more than one per day had a virtually identical BMI of 24.4. In another study, Kvaavik 2005, the male long-term "low consumers" had an average BMI of 25.6 and the long-term "high consumers" had an average BMI of 25.3.[14] The female group showed similar results

(23.4 versus 24.0 in the low and high groups respectively). Several other studies have reported similar results.[15]

Fourth, as discussed in more detail below, a number of studies found the mean annual weight gain in persons consistently consuming high levels of SSBs to be essentially identical to the weight gain in people consistently consuming low levels.[16]

Finally, high levels of "added sugars" are not consistently associated with increased BMI levels and are not correlated with levels of obesity and overweight. (Marriott 2010; Gaesser 2007; Hill 1995).[17] A recent study by Marriott et al., based on data from 15,189 subjects in the NHANES database, showed that subjects whose diet included 0-5% of added sugars had a mean BMI of 28.9 while those whose diet included >35% of added sugars had a mean BMI of 28.1.[18] The investigators found that 88.8% of obese individuals had energy intake from added sugars below 25% of their total energy intake (the level recommended by the IOM), and only 11.2% were above the 25% recommendation. The pattern of energy intake from added sugars was essentially the same for normal weight persons, although a slightly higher percentage of those individuals had energy intake from added sugars above 25% (12.4%). The authors summarized the data for overweight and obese persons as follows:

> The highest percentage of persons who were overweight or obese consumed >5 ≤ 15% of their energy from added sugars (>5 ≤10% energy from added sugar: 22.5% overweight; 22.9% obese; >10 ≤15% energy from added sugars: 24.3% overweight, 22.1% obese). With each 5% increase in added sugars category above 15% added sugars intake, we found a lower prevalence of overweight and obese individuals, with the exception of >35% added sugars for BMI ≥ 30 where the prevalence increased to 3.2%.

Some studies do find an association between consumption of SSBs and weight gain. However, a closer examination of the data demonstrates that these studies suggest that an acute change in dietary consumption of SSBs, i.e., a sharp increase or decrease in consumption, is associated with a modest weight change that does not continue to increase over time. In other words, the association appears only for consumers who change their consumption significantly, not for consumers whose consumption has remained consistent.

For example, in the Schulze 2004 study discussed above, women who increased their SSB consumption from one serving or less per week (low consumers) to one serving or more per day (high consumers) had a net increase in weight of 2.8 pounds over a 4 year period compared to women who remained low consumers. Similarly, in a prospective cohort from the Black Women's Health Study with a 6-year follow-up, women who increased their SSB consumption from one serving or less per week (low consumers) to one serving or more per day (high consumers) had a net increase in weight of 4.2 pounds compared to women who remained low consumers.[19] Similar results were seen in a number of other studies.[20]

Importantly, the effect of an acute change in dietary intake of SSBs appears to reach a plateau after the first six months. For example, data from an ad hoc analysis performed on subjects enrolled in the PREMIER study, an 18-month behavioral intervention study, indicates that the effect of SSB consumption on weight reaches a plateau after approximately 6 months. In that study, an acute decrease in SSB consumption resulted in a 10.6 pounds loss at six months and 11.4 pounds at 18 months, a change of only 0.9 pounds over the last 12 months of the intervention.[21]

The results of Mozaffarian 2011,[22] cited by the Department, support this conclusion. That study examined the impact of dietary and other lifestyle changes, not whether consistently high or low beverage consumption is associated with overweight or obesity. In addition, the authors noted that "as seen in prior analyses of sugar-sweetened beverages, changes in lifestyle may be the most relevant for weight gain. Persons may achieve a new steady-state weight within months after a change in regular physical activity, diet, or other lifestyle habits, highlighting the importance of repeated assessments over time to discern long-term effects."

Over the long-term, consistently high consumption of SSBs does not appear to be associated with a meaningful differential increase in weight compared to consistently low or no consumption of SSBs; both groups gain the same small amount of weight. Three long-term prospective observational studies with large study populations confirm this conclusion in a real-world setting. As noted above, Schulze et al. and Palmer et al. found little or no difference in weight gain in persons who consistently consumed less than one serving of SSBs per week (low consumers) and those who consumed more than one serving per day (high consumers). Schulze et al. reported that, despite a significant difference in total caloric intake at baseline (~ 300 kCal per day), compared to low consumers, the high consumers had nearly identical weight gain (6.8 pounds versus 7.1 pounds) over the 4 year period.[23] Palmer et al. reported that high consumers had nearly very similar weight gain compared to low consumers over a period of 5 years (12.8 pounds versus 10.8 pounds), despite taking in a total of 600 kCal more per day at baseline.[24] Similarly, a longitudinal study of 422 men and women with 18-20 years of follow-up in Norway found no association between long-term intake of SSBs and body weight.[25]

Many of the review articles on this topic do not adequately address the data that are not consistent with an association between soft drinks and obesity. For example, the Malik et al. 2006[26] review discusses the Schulze 2004 paper but does not mention the fact, discussed above, that the weight change in persons consistently consuming high quantities of SSBs was no different from the weight change in those consistently consuming low quantities of SSBs. Nor does Malik acknowledge that those who maintained low consumption of SSBs – most people in the study – gained 11.6 pounds over the study period.

The Malik et al. review also fails to account for several inconsistencies in four studies related to children and adolescents on which they performed a meta-analysis, Berkey 2004, Phillips 2004, Ludwig 2001 and James 2004.[27] These four studies do not provide consistent evidence of a meaningful relationship between SSB consumption and weight change. For example, while Berkey et al. reported that increased consumption of SSBs was associated with a small increase in BMI in boys (+0.03 BMI units – less than ½ pound in a year – per daily serving), the authors acknowledged that the association was not present at all for girls. Similarly, while girls consuming a higher percentage of calories in the form of soda had an increase in BMI z-score over a 10-year follow-up in Phillips et al., the girls were underweight at baseline (BMI z-score -0.27) and had normal BMI z-scores at study's end (0.02); significantly, no association was found between soda consumption and body fat. Ludwig et al. found that increased consumption of SSBs during the study was associated with an increase in obesity risk (RR 1.60 per daily serving) but found no relationship between baseline SSB consumption levels and obesity risk. Finally, the results of the randomized controlled trial conducted by James et al. cannot offer any information about the relationship between SSB consumption and weight as SSB consumption remained unchanged during the trial period in both the control and the intervention group.

Malik et al. point to Dubois 2007[28] as finding that "regular consumers of SSBs between meals had a 2.4 fold greater odds of being overweight compared with nonconsumers ($P<0.05$)." But the study also found that total daily consumption of SSBs during the same time period was not associated with an increased risk of being overweight. In other words, the authors did not find an association between the amount of SSB consumption and weight, but only between the time that the SSBs were consumed (between meals versus with meals) and weight. Neither the study authors nor the Malik paper adequately explain this discrepancy in the results.

Malik et al. and other reviewers also rely on studies that only reported effects in small subsets of the study population. For example, in the Sichieri et al.[29] study cited by Malik et al., the authors reported that reducing consumption of sugar-sweetened carbonated beverages over a single school year did not result in a reduction in BMI, weight, or rates of overweight/obesity, except in one subgroup of overweight girls. Likewise, Ebbeling et al.[30] found no effect on BMI of reducing SSB consumption over 25 weeks across the full trial population; indeed, both the intervention group (which decreased consumption by 280 kCal per day) and the control group (which decreased its consumption by 40 kCal per day) gained weight. Only a subset of subjects in the highest weight tertile at baseline experienced a small weight loss (~ 4 pounds). The overall results of these studies are not consistent with the hypothesis that SSBs are a leading driver of the obesity epidemic, yet the studies are commonly among the evidence held out as supportive of that hypothesis.

Finally, these studies must be viewed in the context of the full set of literature evaluating the relationship between consumption of SSBs and weight change. For example, at least seven studies have found no significant association between SSB consumption and weight status in children or adolescents, and those studies must be considered when evaluating the evidence as a whole. (Blum 2005; Johnson 2007; Laurson 2007; Libuda 2008; Mrdjenovic 2003; Newby 2004; Vanselow 2009).[31]

Considering the studies as a whole, a consistently strong association between SSBs and overweight or obesity, which would be necessary to establish causation, is lacking. The data are contradictory both within and across studies. Also, the reported relative risks[32] are generally very small (1.6 or lower), and small relative risks must be interpreted with caution, particularly in studies relying upon the subjects' memory as to what he or she ate over a given period of time. While food frequency questionnaires are validated survey instruments, the tools used in epidemiology are often not precise enough to separate true associations from spurious ones when the reported risks are small. When such small risks are combined with inconsistencies and involve an area as complicated as determining the causes of obesity, much clearer data would be required in order to conclude that any reported association is, in fact, causal.

3. The scientific evidence does not support the conclusion that drinking sugar sweetened beverages causes diabetes.

Type II diabetes develops over many years and has many known and unknown risk factors that contribute to its development. Among others, known risk factors include chronic overweight and obesity, family history, ethnicity, age, and physical inactivity. The presence of a significant number of known and unknown confounders makes interpretation of data from even the best data sets difficult and cautions against drawing conclusions from modest relative risks and inconsistent results. The interpretation of the results is complicated by the fact that the studies are attempting the difficult task of assessing the potential contribution of changes in a relatively small component of the diet (SSB consumption) on the overall risk of developing a complex, multi-factorial disease

[32] The results of epidemiologic studies are often expressed as a relative risk (RR) or an odds ratio (OR). A RR or OR of 1.0 indicates no association. A RR or OR above 1.0 indicates an association, and below 1 indicates an inverse relationship. Whether the RR or OR is statistically significant is also important. Statistical significance is often expressed by the confidence interval, thus a RR of 2.5 (1.8 to 3.0), has a confidence interval of 1.8 to 2.5. If the confidence interval excludes 1.0, the risk is statistically significant.

(type II diabetes). Indeed, the complexity of the disease and the inherent limitations of even the best data sets predict the inconsistent results discussed below.

The scientific data does not support a causal relationship between consumption of SSBs and the development of type II diabetes mellitus. On the contrary, the data are inconsistent, with some studies finding a small increased risk while others find no risk. Moreover, the few positive studies report relative risks in the range of 1.08 – 1.56; in the presence of multiple confounding factors, relative risks that small are insufficient to support a causal inference.

Evidence for a relationship between SSBs and diabetes comes from Schulze et al. who reported a modest relative risk of 1.32 (CI, 1.01-1.73) for the development of diabetes over an eight-year follow-up period in persons who consumed one or more servings of SSBs per day as compared to those who consumed one or less serving of SSBs per week. (Schulze 2004). Similarly, a study by Odegaard et al. reported a relative risk of 1.42 (CI, 1.25-1.62) in participants in the Singapore Chinese Health Study consuming a two or more servings of soft drinks per week compared to those subjects consuming virtually none. (Odegaard 2010).

On the other hand, two high quality studies reported opposite results. In a study with essentially identical design to Schulze, there was no association between sugar-sweetened soft drink consumption and diabetes over a period of 10 years in 43,000 women from the Black Women's Health Study after adjusting for baseline BMI, age, family history, physical activity, tobacco use, and diet (RR 1.05, CI 0.90-1.23).[33] (Palmer 2008). Similarly, a study by Paynter et al. found no association between consumption of SSBs and diabetes risk over a nine year follow-up in 12,000 participants in the Atherosclerosis Risk in Communities (ARIC) Study. (Paynter 2006)[34]. After adjusting for age, race, family history of diabetes, caloric intake, dietary fiber, tobacco use, alcohol use, activity, hypertension, baseline BMI and waist-to-hip ratio, the authors reported a relative risk of 1.03 (CI, 0.82-1.28) in men and 1.01 (CI, 0.79-1.29) in women. These inconsistent findings in four high-quality studies (two reporting minimally increased risk and two reporting no increased risk) do not permit any affirmative conclusion about the relationship between SSB consumption and diabetes.

Additional studies further underscore the inconsistency of the data and emphasize the need to interpret the conflicting results of Schulze, Odegaard, Palmer and Paynter with caution. In a well-controlled study assessing the risk of gestational diabetes over a period of 10 years, Chen et al. found no increased risk with all SSB consumption (the [33] The paper, as written, actually states that sugar-sweetened soft drink consumption increases diabetes risk. However, the authors rely on a relative risk not adjusted for BMI to reach this conclusion. Control for baseline BMI is critical in any study attempting to assess diabetes risk.

[34] Paynter NP, et al. "Coffee and sweetened beverage consumption and the risk of type 2 diabetes mellitus. The Atherosclerosis Risk in Communities Study." Am J Epidemiol 2006; 164[11]: 1075-1084.

primary analysis). (Chen 2009).[35] In a secondary analysis, the authors reported an increased risk with sugar-sweetened cola (RR 1.22, CI 1.01-1.47) but not with other SSBs (RR 0.92, CI 0.73-1.16). While the authors suggest that this finding indicates that there may be something unique about sugar-sweetened colas (as opposed to other SSBs) that confers an increased risk of diabetes, the risk for sugar-sweetened colas (based on the relative risks and confidence intervals reported in the article) does not appear to be statistically different from that for other SSBs.[36] At the same time, Bazzano et al. followed more than 70,000 women over an 18-year period and reported higher risk of developing diabetes in persons consuming high quantities of orange juice (HR 1.24, CI 1.1-1.39), apple juice (HR 1.15, CI 1.08-1.22), grapefruit juice (HR 1.14, CI 1.05-1.23), diet soda (HR 1.11, CI 1.07-1.16), and fruit punch (HR 1.10, CI 1.06-1.15) than those consuming sugar-sweetened cola (HR 1.08, CI 1.04-1.12). (Bazzano 2008).[37] Contrary to the conclusion presented by Chen et al., these results suggest that there is nothing unique about the risk for sugar-sweetened cola as opposed to other SSBs; in fact, a relative risk of 1.08 suggests that sugar-sweetened colas do not have a meaningful effect on diabetes risk. Similarly, Montonen et al., in a Finnish study of 4,000 adults, found no significant increased risk of diabetes in persons consuming the highest level of soft drinks (although the trend was significant for increasing consumption) but reported an increased risk in people consuming sweetened berry juice (RR 1.56, CI 1.08-2.26). (Montonen 2007).[38] Yet another study by Nettleton et al. found no association between sugar-sweetened soda and diabetes over a 7-year period in 4,000 adult participants in the Multi-Ethnic Study of Atherosclerosis (MESA). (Nettleton 2009).[39]

In summary the inconsistent nature of the data, the low relative risks reported in the few positive studies, and the lack of the ability to control adequately for confounding does not permit a conclusion that SSB consumption leads to the development of diabetes.

4. The scientific evidence does not support the conclusion that drinking sugar sweetened beverages causes cardiovascular disease.

Cardiovascular disease (CVD) is a term that refers to a collection of diseases and disorders affecting the blood vessels, including coronary artery disease, cerebrovascular disease, peripheral vascular disease, and others. There are numerous known and unknown risk factors contributing to the development of CVD. The American Heart Association identifies age, gender, race, tobacco abuse, high cholesterol, high blood pressure, obesity/overweight and diabetes mellitus as major risk factors. Other known risk factors include physical inactivity, a diet high in saturated fat, stress, and alcohol abuse. As with type II diabetes, the presence of a significant number of known and unknown confounders makes interpretation of data from even the best data sets difficult and cautions against drawing conclusions from modest relative risks and inconsistent results. The interpretation of results is complicated by the fact that the studies are attempting the difficult task of assessing the potential contribution of changes in a relatively small component of the diet (SSB consumption) on the overall risk of developing a complex, multi-factorial disease (CVD). Specific to CVD, there also are too few studies, and therefore too little data, on which to base scientific conclusions. The Malik review concedes that the available data are "limited."

The Department of Health refers to the study by Fung et al.[40] as finding an association between SSBs and CVD. Fung followed a population of more than 80,000 women from the Nurses' Health Study for a period of 24 years to assess whether increased consumption of SSBs is associated with an increased risk of coronary heart disease, specifically nonfatal myocardial infarction and fatal CHD. The study did not address other types of CVD, including uncomplicated coronary artery disease, peripheral vascular disease, cerebrovascular disease, etc.; indeed, women with diabetes, angina, and coronary bypass surgery were intentionally eliminated from the analysis. After adjustment for known confounders, women who consumed two or more servings of SSBs per day did not have a statistically significantly increased risk of CHD compared to women consuming less than one serving per month, RR 1.21 (CI 0.95, 1.53), although the trend for increasing consumption was significant, p=0.005. At the same time, the authors reported an increased risk of CHD with increasing consumption of sugar-sweetened colas, RR 1.25 (CI 1.07, 1.47; p=0.005 for trend) and fruit drinks and punches, RR 1.33 (CI 1.03, 1.71; p=0.03 for trend), but not for sugar-sweetened carbonated non-cola beverages. Given the small and conflicting risk reported in the study and the presence of numerous known and unknown confounders, Fung cannot support the conclusion that SSB consumption has any meaningful role in the development of CVD.

Conclusion

Obesity is an important public health challenge that requires effective, science-based solutions. The Department's proposal to restrict the size of "sugary drinks" sold in specified food service establishments to 16 ounces or less is not such a solution and rests on the scientifically flawed premise that sugar sweetened beverages are a "leading driver" of the obesity epidemic. The available scientific evidence indicates that sugar sweetened beverage consumption has been declining for years and plays a relatively small role in weight and energy balance over the long-term. At least half of adults do not drink sugar sweetened beverages at all, and several studies report no meaningful difference in rates of overweight and obesity between those who consistently drink more soda compared to those who consistently drink less. There is no scientific basis on which to conclude that limiting the serving size of sugar sweetened beverages will have any impact on the rates of overweight and obesity in New York.

1	The ban would cause harm to small local businesses This ban is extremely un-popular, fueling concerns that if, and when, this fails to significantly reduce obesity rates, it will hinder future better attempts to implement legislation to reduce obesity.	Letitia James; Why the Soda Ban Won't Work; Huffington Post; July 6, 2012	• "[T]he proposal -- if passed -- would not only be ineffective, but also harmful to small local businesses, specifically those servicing low-income communities." • "There are few who would criticize Mayor Bloomberg for working towards the goal of a healthier New York. Unfortunately, there are many who would criticize Mayor Bloomberg for seeking to achieve that goal the wrong way. In fact, most New Yorkers think the so-called 'soda ban'-- which would prohibit the sale of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces by most food establishments -- is a bad idea."
2	The ban imposes a significant and arbitrary burden on business and commerce.	Seth Goldman; Mayor Bloomberg and Our 16.9-Ounce Tea, The Wall Street Journal, July 22, 2012	• "Under the proposed changes to Article 81 of the NYC Health Code, food-service establishments would not be able to sell packages larger than 16 ounces for drinks that have more than 25 calories per eight-ounce serving. Honest Tea's top-selling item is our organic Honey Green Tea, which has 35 calories per eight-ounce serving and is in a 16.9 oz. bottle. We label 70 calories on the front of the package so consumers know what's in the full bottle. We initially went with 16.9 oz. (which is 500 milliliters) because it is a standard size that our bottle supplier had in stock at the time. We subsequently invested several hundred thousand dollars for 16.9 oz. bottle molds. Is 16.9 ounces the perfect size? Who knows? As a beverage marketer, we willingly submit to the unforgiving judgment of the market. What we did not anticipate was an arbitrary decision to constrain consumer choice."
3	The ban will not work	Peter Ubel; New York's soda prohibition won't work, Philadelphia Inquirer, June, 5, 2012	• "As a physician who has written extensively about the unconscious forces that cause people to overeat, I believe governments should pursue bold initiatives to fight obesity. Unfortunately, though, Bloomberg's Big Gulp ban is a bad idea."
4	The ban has an unfair impact on low-income individuals The ban will not have health benefits, and if, and when, this fails to significantly reduce obesity rates, it will hinder future better attempts to implement	Brian Wansink & David Just; How Bloomberg's Soft Drink Ban Will Backfire on NYC Public Health; The Atlantic; June 14, 2012	• "Who buys large soft drinks? It's not just the people who may have some disregard for their weight. It may also be the construction worker who buys a single drink and nurses it all day. It may be the family of three who decides to split a single drink to save money. Soft drinks are bought by one-third of the poorest 2 million New Yorkers, but only one-sixth of the richest 1 million -- those who prefer to sip their fruit smoothies and lattes without regard for the burden on the less affluent

5	The ban has an unfair impact on low-income individual	April Fulton; Bloomberg's Sugary Drink Ban May Not Change Soda Drinker's Habits; The Salt: NPR; May 31, 2012	• "'The major reason why people buy larger-sized sodas is that they walk in and see the price per ounce,' [David] Just says. 'It makes economic sense for them.' And because soda drinkers tend to have lower income than, say, people who get a daily Starbucks Grande Skim Latte with a vanilla shot, it matters. Just says: 'I'm afraid this proposal is targeted more at class than obesity.'"
6	The ban has an unfair impact on low-income individuals	Kathleen Blanchard; NYC ban on sugary sodas: Does it really target obesity?; EmaxHealth.com; June 3, 2012	• "David Just wonders why they're avoiding other high calorie sugary drinks, like fruit juices and chocolate shakes. He says in a press release, 'This proposed ban is targeting a certain group of people. I also worry that this is a little bit of a regressive tax: It is not directly targeting obesity; it is targeting soda. Sodas overall are a pretty small part of the equation when it comes to obesity.'"
7	The ban has an unfair impact on low-income individuals	Mario Anzuoni; The Classist Side of Mayor Bloomberg's War on Soda; The Atlantic Wire; May 31, 2012	• [T]here's an even darker side to bans. They have a socio-economic impact, by which I mean, some people are more affected by bans than others. Bans widen the divide between the rich, who can find a way around them, and the poor, who perhaps cannot. And while Bloomberg's tactics are obviously part of what people dub a 'nanny state' ideology, in which he's telling us what to do, he's telling some people what to do more than others. Rich people, among whom one is billionaire Bloomberg himself, are not going to be impacted by a soda ban the same way poor New Yorkers are—if the wealthy prefer huge bottles of soda, they'll have no trouble continuing to find them. And the problem that Bloomberg's trying to "fix"—obesity—is, according to the stats and research, a 'poor' problem, not a rich one. This makes Bloomberg's move seem ever the more paternalistic. A class of people whom he's judged unable to make the proper decision for themselves is now being told what to do, by someone who knows better."
8	The ban has an unfair impact on low-income individuals This is a politically motivated knee-jerk reaction to a significant problem, but it is not a solution based in actual science.	Kathryn Tuggle; Banning Large Sodas: Who Loses, Who Wins; FOXBusiness; June 1, 2012	• "Jeff Lenard, vice president of communications for NACS, says that any business forced to implement changes will incur additional expenses, and those expenses will most certainly be passed onto consumers. '"If you spend money to change your business, you're going to have to pass those costs onto the consumer. Some businesses will have to spend tens of thousands of dollars to redo counter space or purchase new cups and lids.'" • "From a medical perspective, Bethany Thayer, a registered dietician and spokesperson for the Academy of Nutrition and Dietetics, says that at this point, it's impossible to tell whether or not the city's proposed ban will have any impact on obesity rates – 'The research isn't available to let us know whether or not restricting or taxing foods will have an impact on obesity rates,' says Thayer. 'We do know that too many sugary

Grynbaum; At Movies and Beaches, Soda Industry Makes Its Case; New York Times Blog; July 5, 2012	• "The board is designed not to be subject to political pressure," [the mayoral spokesperson] said. "It's designed to make decisions about public health based on science."
10	This is a politically motivated knee-jerk reaction to a significant problem, but it is not a solution based in actual science.	Mary MacVean; New York soda ban won't work, marketing experts say; Los Angeles Times; June 4, 2012	• However, caving to political pressure is exactly what the mayor is asking the board to do here. Actual scientists, on whom Bloomberg purportedly relied for his science behind the ban, make it clear that this is really about politics, rather than science. In this LA Times article, David Just states "Because of the political pressure to do something – and really anything – about obesity, we are trying to throw in a bunch of policies that are not proven."
11	This is a politically motivated knee-jerk reaction to a significant problem, but it is not a solution based in actual science.	Ronald Bailey; Salt Is Good For You?; reason.com; June 4, 2012.	• Bloomberg did this with his proposed salt ban as well, proposing "health-based" decisions not actually rooted in solid scientific research: "The attack on sugary sodas is just the latest salvo in NYC Mayor and Nanny-in-Chief Michael Bloomberg's bland food assault. Two years ago, his target was salt - advocating a 25 percent cut in salt in packaged and restaurant foods to be implemented over the next five years. [However, in a recent] Sunday's New York Times, health science reporter Gary Taubes has an excellent op/ed exposing how anti-salt campaigners ignore the accumulating scientific evidence that eating salt is not a huge public health problem."
12	The ban is arbitrary, and other less intrusive options to combat obesity would be better.	Juli Weiner; Banned! Bloomberg Flushes Big Soda in New York; Vanity Fair; May 31, 2012	• "Your days in New York are numbered, 17 oz., high-calorie, non-fruit, non-dairy, non-alcoholic drinks sold in 'food service establishments' other than grocery stores, convenience stores, vending machines, newsstands, and certain corner stores and bodegas."
13	The ban is arbitrary, and other less intrusive options to combat obesity would be better.	Zack Fink; Big Gulp March; Your New Now.com; July 9, 2012	• "'You could have a 7-11 next to a bodega. The bodega is banned, the 7-11 is not. There is a question as to whether or not Starbucks is permitted to sell sugary sodas and if it's a supermarket, they are exempt as well. So the arbitrariness of this really bothers me,' City Council Member Letitia James said."

15	There has been a negative	David Boaz; Mayor Bloomber's Sweet	• "[W]ho exactly is going to impose this sweeping ban? Not the people, in a referendum. Not a constitutional convention.

This 'far-reaching ban,' as the Times describes it, will be imposed on 8 million free citizens of New York by the city's unelected Board of Health, all of whose members are appointed by . . . the mayor." (article written by David Boaz, Executive Vice President of the Cato Institute)
16	There has been a negative reaction even from researchers and nutritionists concerned about obesity	Elizabeth Ward; Sugar shock: Should your sweet tooth be regulated?; Nutrition Nation; June 2, 2012	• "As a dietitian, I spend my time trying to get people to eat better. Yet, even I bristle at legislating sugar intake, and I'm not the only one. Brian Wansink, PhD, is the founder and director of the Cornell Food and Brand Lab and author of Mindless Eating: Why We Eat More Than We Think. 'Restrictions on behavior often lead to unintended consequences," he says. Like more regulation. 'First, we restrict sugar. Next, we could be taxing fat in foods or meat, or restricting access to them in some other way. There's really no end in sight,' Wansink says."
17	The ban is arbitrary, will be ineffective, and is having a negative reactions from the public	Jacob Sullum; Bloomberg Insists His Plan to Limit New Yorkers' Soda Sizes Cannot Possibly Work; reason.com; May 31, 2012	• "The size rule does not apply at all to convenience stores, supermarkets, or vending machines, so Big Gulps, giant Slurpees, and large bottles of soda will still be readily available. Bloomberg also plans to exempt fruit juices, which typically have more calories per ounce than sugar-sweetened soda, and milk-based drinks. So while New Yorkers won't be allowed to order 20 ounces of Coke (240 calories), they will still be able to get a 20-ounce Starbucks whole-milk latte (290 calories) or even a 24-ounce Double Chocolaty Frappuccino (520 calories), not to mention a 20-ounce milkshake (about 800 calories). In other words, Bloomberg is right when he says there will still be lots of opportunities for New Yorkers to consume large quantities of high-calorie drinks, which means he does not even have a sound paternalistic justification for his meddling. He is screwing with people not to protect them from their own foolish choices but just to create the appearance of doing so. Or maybe just because he can."

Ditto, it would seem, of salt and alcohol. But we all knew he wouldn't stop there."
19	This is a politically motivated knee-jerk reaction to a significant problem, but it is not a solution based in actual science.	W.W.; Civilizing Thirst; the Economist; June 4, 2012	• "The most comprehensive meta-analysis to date of the relationship between the consumption of sugary drinks and body mass index in children and adolescents "found that the association between [sugared beverage] consumption and BMI was near zero, based on the current body of scientific evidence". Scott Lemieux cites other studies indicating that carbonated soft-drink consumption is declining anyway."

Why the Soda Ban Won't Work

Posted: 07/05/2012 3:39 pm

There are few who would criticize Mayor Bloomberg for working towards the goal of a healthier New York. Unfortunately, there are many who would criticize Mayor Bloomberg for seeking to achieve that goal the wrong way. In fact, most New Yorkers think the so-called "soda ban"-- which would prohibit the sale of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces by most food establishments -- is a bad idea.

Although we stand with Mayor Bloomberg's efforts to support New Yorkers in making healthy food choices, and recognize the city's outrageous rates of obesity, heart disease, and diabetes -- especially among communities of color -- we remain deeply concerned about the proposal for the following reasons:

a. the ban, if implemented, will yield an adverse economic impact for small businesses and may result in job losses; and
b. the ban would harm producers that ship soda-syrup and cups across state lines into New York, possibly violating the federal commerce clause; and
c. the ban infringes on the civil liberties (choice) of New Yorkers, and may be overturned

And choice very much matters. In 2011, federal officials rejected Mayor Bloomberg's proposal to bar the city's food stamp users from buying soda and other high-sugar drinks. This proposal, if passed, might also be struck down.

For a ban meant to address health in low-income communities, it was particularly concerning to us that it was brought forth during a time when the city was considering cuts to minority health programs. And scratching the surface of the proposal, we believe the ban does not consider the complexity of how and why people acquire food and drink, and instead applies a simplified solution to a layered problem (one highly likely to fall short of its intended goal). For instance, the ban would exempt drinks over 16 ounces that contained over 50 percent milk. This would include drinks like a 24 fl. oz. serving of a certain corporation's popular blended crème caffeinated beverage, a drink that is roughly 470 calories -- equivalent to the amount of calories in a medium 10-ounce steak. Yet it would ban a single-serving of soda, juice, enhanced water beverage, tea, coffee or sports drink of equivalent size if purchased from certain establishments.

It's also important to look at where people acquire such large drinks. The average New Yorker goes to the movie theater (known for large single-servings of beverages) only four times a year, and attends sports venues even less regularly. Daily trips to the neighborhood deli store (or 'bodega') are much more common occurrences. Such neighborhood stores selling over 50 percent food products fall under the jurisdiction of the City's Department of Health, and therefore would be limited by the ban. Those selling under 50 percent food products would be exempt from the ban. This effectively means that two stores on the same block might very well be held to different standards. In fact, some major chain stores would be exempted by this same standard.

This kind of arbitrary standard is what leads us to believe that the proposal -- if passed -- would not only be ineffective, but also harmful to small local businesses, specifically those servicing low-income communities.

Most importantly, we simply feel that the administration should shift focus towards the much more difficult goal of creating programs to subsidize healthy food access, including implementing the recommendations outlined in the 2009 New York City Council report 'FoodWorks: A Vision to Improve NYC's Food System.' The real issue at hand, in our opinion, is access to low-cost, quality healthy food across this city. We need to do even more to bring comprehensive food-access programs to local communities.

While community-based food advocacy coalitions have taken on the daunting task of developing and supporting localized community-supported agriculture (CSAs), food cooperatives, farmers markets, and school-based food networks, the city makes it increasingly difficult for local communities to establish and maintain neighborhood gardens (a major source of localized food growth), under the fear of them becoming permanent institutions that would be difficult to displace. If the administration is truly interested in getting New Yorkers outdoors, there should be appropriate funding put towards the rehabilitation of outdoor parks and playgrounds, as well as indoor recreational spaces, to encourage New Yorkers (many of whom cannot afford a gym membership) to exercise.

A ban is easy, establishing real solutions in the long term is much more difficult. And frankly we believe moving towards any of these goals would have a greater impact on public health than a beverage ban that might hurt small businesses, would be arbitrarily applied, and may very well be illegal. When Mayor Bloomberg proposes more real solutions (like this) to our public health problems, we will be standing right behind him. But the soda ban is simply bad for New York.
The deadline for public comment on the soda ban is July 24, 2012.

Seth Goldman: Mayor Bloomberg and Our 16.9-Ounce Tea

Is 16.9 oz. the perfect size? Who knows? We willingly submit to the unforgiving judgment of the market.

By SETH GOLDMAN

As a fellow entrepreneur with a public-service orientation, I have been a longtime admirer of Mayor Michael Bloomberg's entrepreneurial spirit and commitment to acting on his principles. Having launched Honest Tea 14 years ago with five thermoses and a belief that consumers were thirsty for a lower-calorie natural and organic beverage, I appreciate all he has accomplished. However, I write today as an entrepreneur frustrated by a proposal that arbitrarily complicates the practical realities of commerce.

When the mayor announced his proposal to ban sugar-sweetened drinks in portions over 16 ounces from New York City restaurants, many of my friends assumed Honest Tea would welcome the news as a public initiative to complement Honest Tea's long-standing commitment to marketing lower-calorie drinks. Yet the mayor's proposal would actually prevent Honest Tea from selling most of our drinks in New York City restaurants.

Under the proposed changes to Article 81 of the NYC Health Code, food-service establishments would not be able to sell packages larger than 16 ounces for drinks that have more than 25 calories per eight-ounce serving. Honest Tea's top-selling item is our organic Honey Green Tea, which has 35 calories per eight-ounce serving and is in a 16.9 oz. bottle. We label 70 calories on the front of the package so consumers know what's in the full bottle.

We initially went with 16.9 oz. (which is 500 milliliters) because it is a standard size that our bottle supplier had in stock at the time. We subsequently invested several hundred thousand dollars for 16.9 oz. bottle molds. Is 16.9 ounces the perfect size? Who knows? As a beverage marketer, we willingly submit to the unforgiving judgment of the market. What we did not anticipate was an arbitrary decision to constrain consumer choice.

PRNewsFoto/Honest Tea

One response we considered was putting 0.9 ounce less liquid in our bottles, but that would create a separate set of complications. We fill our bottles to the brim—not just because we like to deliver an "Honest" value, but also to ensure quality since we do not use preservatives. Then there is the costly prospect of having to change all of our UPC codes (those complicated black bars found on every product on a grocery shelf) because we would be offering a different liquid volume—all for 0.9 ounces!

And what if next year, Cambridge, Mass., comes up with a ban on 15.5-ounce containers? As soon as government starts getting between us and the consumer, we quickly find ourselves considering scenarios that are not based on market realities or consumer needs.

I challenge the mayor and the New York City Board of Health to seriously consider the impediments that entrepreneurs already face in our efforts to offer lower-calorie drinks. Starting a business and building a challenger brand with modest resources is already a daunting task. The proposed ban would create additional barriers to beverage innovation.

One of my favorite Honest Tea bottle-cap quotes is the Chinese proverb "If we don't change the direction in which we are headed, we will end up where we are going." Given that the life expectancy of our children's generation is lower than ours, there's no question our nation's health indicators are headed in the wrong direction.

But the mayor's proposal will not move us in the right direction. The obesity problem was not caused by one industry alone, and targeting one industry is not the solution. Working together on a multifaceted approach is.

New York's soda prohibition won't work

New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg's brave and provocative new plan to prohib t sales of large soft drinks would seem to promote public health at minimal cost to res dents. It looks like the kind of tough regulatory action the nat on needs to combat an obesity epidem c that could make this generation of schoolchildren the first in centuries to have a shorter average life span than their parents.

As a phys cian who has wr tten extensively about the unconsc ous forces that cause people to overeat, I believe governments should pursue bold in tiatives to fight obes ty. Unfortunately, though, Bloomberg's Big Gulp ban is a bad dea.

To understand why, it's useful to compare the proposed ban on large sodas with the trans-fats ban the c ty instituted several years ago. They share important features.

In both cases, the product in quest on is undeniably unhealthy. Trans fats are known to be more likely to cause cardiac disease than any other commonly used cooking oils.

And in both cases, restaurants can turn to alternatives. After the trans-fats ban, they were able to sw tch to other cooking oils, w th no discernible deter oration in the flavor of their offerings. Should the large-soda ban go into effect, restaurants will be able to offer their customers smaller beverages without causing anyone significant harm.

Where the fat and soda bans differ, however, is in their coherence. Trans fats are a particularly od ous class of substances, 80 percent of which are artif cially manufactured and added to processed foods. By one estimate, a 2 percent increase in the intake of calories from trans fats increased the risk of heart problems by up to 23 percent. This dwarfs the dangers of other fats.

Before the trans-fats ban, the city's health department made earnest efforts to educate restaurants about the problem. But they were completely ineffective, because restaurateurs realized that the cost of making the trans t on to alternative cooking oils would leave them at a compet tive disadvantage.

By banning trans fats in all restaurants, the c ty leveled the playing field, ensuring that all its restaurants would bear the costs of sw tching to alternative fats. And those costs were a small pr ce to pay for the publ c-health benefits of the prohibit on.

Coke, Pepsi, and the like are also artif cially manufactured and processed. And they contain an undeniably harmful substance, too. But that harmful substance (now that Coca-Cola no longer contains cocaine) is sugar, and the sugar in Coke is no more harmful than the sugar in apple juice or a milk shake. This is understandably confusing to res dents, who may wonder why New York is planning to ban large sodas but not triple-decker chocolate cakes, or why the 280 calories in a 24-ounce Coke are somehow worse for them than the 330 calories in a Starbucks peppermint mocha.

The success of most policies depends on publ c support. And incoherent pol cies are difficult for the publ c to embrace.

If Bloomberg were defending his proposed soda policy before the Supreme Court, the just ces would be asking whether t has a "lim ting principle" — a rat onale that would help determine where the pol cy begins and ends. The soda ban doesn't pass this test.

If sugar is the culprit, the c ty's pol cies should go after that culpr t wherever t is. That would require a more sweeping policy, such as a tax on all sugary products, not just Big Gulps. But most people would find such a policy hard to swallow.

How Bloomberg's Soft Drink Ban Will Backfire on NYC Public Health

By Brian Wansink & David Just

The New York mayor defends his prohibition on sugary drinks with an appeal to science, but the very people who carried out the studies in question say he's misread their work.

Joshua Lott/Reuters

On June 1 -- National Donut Day -- New York City's mayor proposed a restaurant ban for any soft drink over 16-ounces. The hope is that by banning big drinks people will drink less and weigh less. He and others cited our research as the science behind the policy. Indeed, a dozen of our studies show when you randomly give people large sizes of food like popcorn and French fries, they overeat. Another of our cited studies showed that people ate 73 percent more soup when eating from a soup bowl that secretly refilled itself.

There's a critical difference between the lab and Lexington Avenue that the mayor's office didn't account for: when Joe the Plumber and Bob the Banker buy soft drinks, they buy the size they want. They aren't randomly forced to take a 44-ouncer when they really wanted a 12-ouncer. Moreover, their Coke or Pepsi doesn't magically refill itself. If that happened, they'd overdrink. Instead, most restaurants give us a choice of a small or large drink -- just as nearly every fast food outlet gives us a choice of small, medium, or large fries, and every movie theatre gives us a choice of small, medium, or large popcorn. People who want a little buy a little, and people who want a lot figure a way to get it.

Yes, we have found that when people are given larger portions, they do drink or eat substantially more. But to claim that these results imply that the ban will be effective is to ignore our larger body of work. In our experiments, subjects were given larger or smaller portions of food in a dining or party setting, where they were unlikely to notice portion size. It is exactly because participants weren't paying attention that we got the results we did.

The mayor's approach, however, overtly denies people portions they are used to be able to get whenever they want them. In similar lab settings, this kind of approach has inspired various forms of rebellion among study participants. For example, openly serving someone lowfat or reduced-calorie meals tends to lead to increased fat or calorie consumption over the whole day. People reason that because they were forced to be good for one meal, they can splurge on snacks and desserts at later meals.

We've dedicated our research careers to helping people eat better. Some of the ideas that have grown from our work and that we've actively promoted include contributing to Smarter School Lunchrooms, 100-calorie packs, and the 2010 Dietary Guidelines. In the interest of disclosure, we've never received money from soft drink companies, nor have we received money from the New York City Department of Health or Mayor Bloomberg's office to investigate a better solution. We fear, however, that the proposed ban will be a huge setback to fighting obesity for two reasons: 1) unless it succeeds, it will poison the water for better solutions, and 2) it won't succeed.

First, consider the McLean Effect: McDonald's launches the visible and controversial low-calorie hamburger; it fails, becoming a cautionary byword for restaurants for the next 15 years, when no one dared introduce low-calorie fast food offerings because "Look what happened to the McLean."

Banning larger sizes is a visible and controversial idea. If it fails, no one will trust that the next big -- and perhaps better -- idea will work, because "Look what happened in New York City." It poisons the water for ideas that may have more potential.

Second, 150 years of research in food economics tells us that people get what they want. Someone who buys a 32-ounce soft drink wants a 32-ounce soft drink. He or she will go to a place that offers fountain refills, or buy two. If the people who want them don't have much money, they might cut back on fruits or vegetables or a bit of their family meal budget.

Who buys large soft drinks? It's not just the people who may have some disregard for their weight. It may also be the construction worker who buys a single drink and nurses it all day. It may be the family of three who decides to split a single drink to save money. Soft drinks are bought by one-third of the poorest 2 million New Yorkers, but only one-sixth of the richest 1 million -- those who prefer to sip their fruit smoothies and lattes without regard for the burden on the less affluent soda drinkers.

Indeed, part of the fervor and support of a ban may be less about politics than personal preferences. One of our current studies shows that a person's belief about various food issues is driven more by their preferences than their politics. For instance, the more fast food you eat, the more unfavorably disposed you are to soft drink taxes, and the more favorably you view high fructose corn syrup. You have the exact opposite views the more you cook at home. In either case, it doesn't matter what your political party is, it's what you do that informs your opinion. But personal preferences is no way to decide policy. People wouldn't stand for a splinter group of vegetarians who campaigned for a ban on restaurant meat entrées over 8-oz, nor would they stand for the two of us -- as non-coffee drinkers -- crusading for a ban on the 20-oz Starbucks Café Mocha because it had 340 calories.

There is a better way to avoid being the McLean of Public Health. Soft drink companies and restaurants make money by selling beverages -- not sugar. By working with these companies, New York City could discover new ways to better promote lower-calorie options. While consumers deride brands, they love promotions. For instance, perhaps there could be a meal deal discount if a person bought a diet drink. Or a perhaps a healthy habit loyalty card would be given out and punched if a person opted for milk, juice, or water instead of a sugary drink. But the mayor's office has said that it does not want to work with retailers to brainstorm options for workable solutions. Retailers and manufacturers that are struggling in a recession would have welcomed a carrot instead of a stick.

Bloomberg's Sugary Drink Ban May Not Change Soda Drinkers' Habits

Will reducing the size of New York city's sodas impact the obesity problem?

When New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg announced last night he wants to ban sodas and many other sugary drinks in 16 ounce servings sizes and up, the reaction was swift and predictable. McDonald's says the ban, which applies to city restaurants and food carts, is "narrowly-focused" and "misguided." Barry Popkin of the School of Public Health at the University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, calls the move "gutsy," and tells The Salt: "Controlling sugary beverage portions sizes is critical for reducing weight gain and [the] risks of diabetes in the U.S."

But will the move actually reduce obesity numbers, as the mayor intends?

"I'm extremely skeptical of that," says David Just, who teaches behavioral economics at Cornell University. He tells The Salt that the way the proposal is structured, people will just rebel.

First, the proposal would essentially go after large-sized sodas sugar-sweetened fruit beverages and large pre-sweetened coffee and tea.

And it would keep these beverages from being sold in restaurants and food carts, delis and movie theaters — but not in most stores. The department says it has the authority to do this in the same way it has the power to inspect and grade its food service establishments.

In New York City, more than half of adults are obese or overweight, says Dr. Thomas Farley, the health commissioner, who blames sweetened drinks for rising obesity rates.

But what the proposal doesn't do is affect drinks containing at least 70 percent fruit juice, and lattes or cappuccinos or milkshakes that contain at least 51 percent dairy, according to this handy New York Health Department chart.

This is a problem for several reasons, Just says. The giant sugary fruit juices and chocolate shakes untouched by the proposal contain tons of calories, too.

And it may drive people who want to drink a lot of soda to buy more smaller sizes and ultimately, pay more money for it, he says.

"The major reason why people buy larger-sized sodas is that they walk in and see the price per ounce," Just says. "It makes economic sense for them."

And because soda drinkers tend to have lower income than, say, people who get a daily Starbucks Grande Skim Latte with a vanilla shot, it matters. Just says: "I'm afraid this proposal is targeted more at class than obesity."

In Cornell's experiments on food and behavior, if people are told that they can't have a large size for health reasons, they tend to fight it. So for example, instead of a 64 oz. soda, they may go buy eight 8 ounce bottles, he says.

Also, Just says, soda is just one small piece of the obesity puzzle, and it's ultimately pretty hard to pin a whole epidemic on one item.

But on the other hand, if smaller drink sizes abound, people may start drinking less. In the book Mindless Eating, Just's colleague Brian Wansink studied people in a movie theater. He tells All Things Considered host Melissa Block that those who given large-sized buckets of popcorn on the way in ate more of it than people given the medium-sized bucket, even if it was stale.

"Even the people who had just eaten dinner and were given terrible popcorn ... still ate about 33 percent more popcorn if they were given a bigger container," he says.

And those 100 calorie snack packs popping up everywhere? "They've had some success," says Just. "But if companies had been mandated to do that, I don't think it would have worked," he adds.

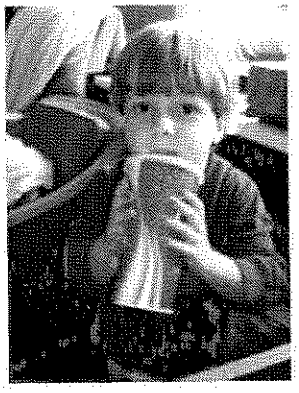
Food and Health Current News



Cornell University experts are taking exception with the proposed ban on sugary drinks in New York City. One of the reasons is that the proposed sugary soda drink ban is targeting beverages; not obesity. Food marketing experts say imposing such a ban is likely to lead to failure; dong little more than making smart consumers - who are going to get what they want anyway - angry.

The concerns over the soda ban come from David Just and Brian Wansink, food marketing experts and professors at Cornell University's Charles H. Dyson School of Applied Economics and Management who suggest the proposed ban is targeting just a group of consumers who specifically buy sodas.

One proposal is to 'reward' consumers for purchasing discounted diet Just also suggests fast-food restaurants should be encouraged to provide low-calorie, healthy menu options.

Studies have shown high numbers of fast food restaurants per capita contributes to obesity. Offering lower calorie foods in areas with fewer fresh markets are available seems to make better sense.

The proposal to ban sodas in New York City targets 'super-size' sugared soft drinks specifically, but most consumers are likely to see the move as an infringement on personal liberties.

The American Beverage Association and the National Restaurant Association are balking at the move that would ban 16 ounce sugar laden soda sales at movie theaters, stadiums and arenas; to be decided at the June 12 meeting of the Board of Health.

Food marketing experts David Just and Brian Wansink aren't the only ones who view the soda ban as a bad idea.

Bloomberg reports Heather Oldani, a McDonald's spokeswoman stated in an e-mail, "This is a complex topic, and one that requires a more collaborative and comprehensive approach."

According to Oldani, the ban won't address the public health issue of obesity because it's "narrowly focused and misguided".

Sugary soft drinks add calories to American diets and New York City officials think they are a major driver of obesity, heart disease and diabetes.

Cornell's Brian Wansink who directs the Cornell Food and Brand Lab and authored the best seller "Mindless Eating", said in a media release, "People buying super-sized sodas want their 32-ounce soft drinks and will find a work-around to the ban. They'll go to a place that offers fountain refills, or they'll buy two. If they don't have much money, they might cut back on fruits or vegetables or a bit of their family meal budget."

He suggests New York City find better ways to help their residents stay healthy with lower-calorie options. He explains soft drink companies and restaurants aren't selling sugar – they're selling beverages.

"We should be encouraging sales of healthier beverages – using a carrot instead of a stick. This approach would be welcomed by struggling retailers and manufacturers alike."

Banning sodas in New York City isn't likely to target obesity because it's just a small part of obesity epidemic that the Cornell food experts view as doomed for failure. Consumers are already cutting back on soda consumption as they become more health conscious. Focusing on selling healthy beverages and discounting diet drinks seems to make a lot more sense that would provide "win-win" opportunities for curbing obesity said Just.

The Classist Side of Mayor Bloomberg's War on Soda

Those who've lived in New York City for a while remember fondly a time when not much of anything was banned at all. And then, slowly, the city started banning up. Maybe sometimes this was a good idea, in practice if not theory (who really wants smoking back in bars?), but it seemed to go against everything New York City stood for, the reasons we came here: for freedom, for lack of judgment, for the opportunity to stay out all night and do exactly wanted, even if that meant drinking excessive quantities of soda.

The New York Post and The Daily News, which both went with Thursday covers featuring teacher "sex scandals," are probably a bit peeved they missed the late-breaking news in the The New York Times that Mayor Bloomberg was proposing a city-wide ban on sodas in sizes over 16 ounces from being sold at restaurants, movie theaters, and street carts. After all, this is excellent tabloid fodder: People hate the threat of having something holy, good, or at least currently legal taken away from them. A controversy over whether people should have the freedom to decide for themselves whether or not they want to consume things is guaranteed to rile folks up and sell some papers, because, if nothing else, we hate to be told what to do.

But there's an even darker side to bans. They have a socio-economic impact, by which I mean, some people are more affected by bans than others. Bans widen the divide between the rich, who can find a way around them, and the poor, who perhaps cannot. And while Bloomberg's tactics are obviously part of what people dub a "nanny state" ideology, in which he's telling us what to do, he's telling some people what to do more than others. Rich people, among whom one is billionaire Bloomberg himself, are not going to be impacted by a soda ban the same way poor New Yorkers are—if the wealthy prefer huge bottles of soda, they'll have no trouble continuing to find them. And the problem that Bloomberg's trying to "fix"—obesity—is, according to the stats and research, a "poor" problem, not a rich one. This makes Bloomberg's move seem ever the more paternalistic. A class of people whom he's judged unable to make the proper decision for themselves is now being told what to do, by someone who knows better. As he himself said, via the Post:

> "All across the country, everybody recognizes obesity as a growing, serious problem," the mayor said in an interview. "But everybody's just sitting around wringing their hands, not doing anything about it . . . I think it's fair to say that while everyone else is sitting around complaining, New York City is acting."

Bloomberg's lack of love for soda isn't a secret. Note the subway ads that have been busy showing us how soda will make us fat? And back in 2010, he pushed a move to ban soda from being bought with food stamps, causing people to worry about the equity of that move. George Hacker, senior policy adviser for the health promotion project of the Center for Science in the Public Interest, told the New York Times' Anemona Hartocollis at the time, "The world would be better, I think, if people limited their purchases of sugared beverages. However, there are a great many ethical reasons to consider why one would not want to stigmatize people on food stamps."

But none of these bans really serve to get to the point, anyway. If we're to talk of equity, we should also ask why healthy, particularly organic, fresh food costs more than packaged, processed food, why lean turkey or chicken is priced higher than the bad, fatty cuts, or why in some cases the cost of milk is greater than the cost of soda. It seems that a better way to promote health to all would by making it easier for everyone to get healthy, good food—not by "outlawing" the bad stuff, or soda, which beverage industry folks say isn't the cause of the problem in the first place, citing reports that say sugared drink consumption has decreased while our obesity issues keep increasing.

The thing about bans, too, is sometimes they're effective and sometimes they're not. In the case of banned books, they might make things harder to get, but they hardly quell anyone's fire for attaining their chosen material. And if you look at, say, Prohibition, well, that didn't work out so well. As one source told The Daily News of Mayor Bloomberg's proposed ban, "He can try, but he can't stop people from getting what they want." People—those who can—are going to figure out a way to do what they want to do, to drink what they want to drink, regardless of a ban, because we are human adults with the rights to choose what disgusting carbonated sugary concoction we want to consume. And how big said cup is.

So, quickly, solutions to the "ban"—which, keep in mind, is only just being proposed, expect the beverage industry to fight hard against it; if it goes ahead, it will be implemented in March of next year—have been being tossed about. Buy more than one smaller soda, for instance. Buy a big bottle in your grocery store, where they'll still be available, and pour it into a cup of your choosing. (Will large-sized to-go cups be soon banned, too?) Head to a 7-11, which might be exempt from said rule. Keep getting refills, there's no law against that! Or, right now, begin to stockpile your giant sodas and store them under your mattress where no one can find them. These are the knee-jerk reactions to being told something might be taken away from you: Argue, figure out how to get it anyway, complain that this is the doing of, as one New York Post commenter put it so eloquently, "a minuscule megalomaniacal martinet." But also, keep in mind that there's more to all this than simply soda.

Banning Large Sodas: Who Loses, Who Wins

by Kathryn Tuggle

Published June 01, 2012 | FOXBusiness

He's banned smoking in bars, restaurants and city parks, and now New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg is taking aim at large fountain drinks.

The mayor, currently in his third term, is proposing eliminating soft drinks larger than 16 ounces in restaurants, stadiums and movie theatres citywide as well as at mobile food carts and delis. While the proposal won't be submitted to the Board of Health until June 12, if passed into law, businesses would be forced to comply as early as June 2013. According to the mayor's office, any violations will cost $200 per offense, and many businesses are up in arms over the extreme measures.

"There are reports that say too many sugary beverages cause obesity, but the one thing that a lot of these reports leave out is ice," says Jeff Lenard, vice president of communications for NACS, The Association for Convenience & Fuel Retailing. "As fountain drink portions get larger, so does the amount of ice. To presume there is 32 ounces of beverage in a 32-ounce cup is oversimplifying things."

Although Bloomberg's proposed ban will not apply to convenience stores, grocery stores or drug stores at this time, Lenard says that any business forced to implement changes will incur additional expenses, and those expenses will most certainly be passed onto consumers.

"If you spend money to change your business, you're going to have to pass those costs onto the consumer. Some businesses will have to spend tens of thousands of dollars to redo counter space or purchase new cups and lids. I would hope that any new law takes into consideration hat companies will have to make capital expenditures to comply," says Lenard.

Although Lenard says the proposed law would mean a "big shift" in how some food and beverage retailers go to market, at the end of he day, the smaller the beverage served, the better the profit margins for companies. On average, NACS reports that cups used at fountain drink machines cost 6 cents no matter the size, lids cost 4 cents, and straws cost 2 cents.

"The cost of the cup doesn't change whether you're selling a 64 ounce or a 12 ounce. The only thing that changes is how much liquid you can put in the cup, so there are actually better margins the smaller the beverage."

But even if retailers stand to make more money on smaller drinks, consumers may only reap more hassle. "Take construction workers for example," Lenard says. "It's not convenient for them to make a couple of trips buying multiple beverages. When they come into a store, they are going to get everything they need for breakfast and lunch, and they're going to want to get those larger-sized drinks. Once he weather heats up, you're going to be seeing an even higher ratio of ice to liquid anyway."

Another group of workers negatively impacted by the proposed restriction could be truckers, who aren't always able to pull over and find a parking spot to buy drinks several times during their daily shift.

"There are all kinds of uncertainties around the proposal,' says Lenard. "Obesity is an equa ion: you have you have more calories in than you have calories out, and passing a law restricting he sale of certain beverages is not necessarily solving the problem."

But Bloomberg says the ban would be a step in the right direction to reduce expanding waistlines.

"This is something we think we have the legal authority to do. We're not taking away anybody's right to do something. We're simply making it different for them in how they do it," said Bloomberg at the All Things Digital Conference in Rancho Palos Verdes Calif. on Thursday.

Knowing the calorie count of a meal or food item is simple in New York City hanks to a law passed in 2008 requiring franchise eateries and restaurants with more than 15 locations to post calorie information on menus. Given that consumers can easily calculate their calories, Coca-Cola, the world's largest beverage company, argues this new proposed ban is overkill.

"The people of New York City are much smarter han the New York City Health Department believes," the company said in a statement. "We are transparent with our consumers. They can see exactly how many calories are in every beverage we serve. We have prominently placed calorie counts on the front of our bottles and cans and in New York City, restaurants already post the calorie content of all their offerings and portion sizes -- including soft drinks.

"New Yorkers...can make their own choices about the beverages they purchase. We hope New Yorkers loudly voice their disapproval about this arbitrary mandate."

Coke didn't end he discussion there, however. Dr. Rhona Applebaum, chief regulatory officer at the company, wrote in a blog post that "searching for a silver bullet that miraculously stops obesity is just not realistic."

She added that in 2009, Coke began placing calorie amounts on the front its packaging to ensure consumers know exactly what they're getting, and that the 90-calorie 7.5 ounce mini can "is designed to help people manage their portions."

But a beverage giant like Coke isn't the only one angry about the proposed law. Stefan Friedman, spokesman for the New York City Beverage Association called the decision "over the top" in a statement sent to Fox Business.

"The city is not going to address the obesity issue by attacking soda because soda is not driving the obesity rates. In fact, as obesity continues to rise, CDC data shows that calories from sugar-sweetened beverages are a small and declining part of the American diet," Friedman wrote. "It's time for serious health professionals to move on and seek solutions hat are going to actually curb obesity. These zealous proposals just distract from the hard work that needs to be done on this front."

From a medical perspective, Bethany Thayer, a registered dietician and spokesperson for the Academy of Nutrition and Dietetics, says that at this point, it's impossible to tell whether or not the city's proposed ban will have any impact on obesity rates.

"The research isn't available to let us know whether or not restricting or taxing foods will have an impact on obesity rates," says Thayer. "We do know that too many sugary beverages can potentially lead to obesity, but there are so many factors that play into obesity there is no evidence to suggest that banning sizes will have any impact. This is certainly a bold way to approach the problem."

And "bold" is just one way of putting it, says Lenard.

"If you banned everything that people could use to harm themselves, then every store in America would have to close," he said. "If people really wanted to buy nothing but healthy foods, then health foods would be the big money maker for stores and restaurants. Unfortunately, he demand isn't there yet. Our industry is slowly moving towards healthier options, but it can't be rushed. This proposal would be rushing it."

At Movies and Beaches, Soda Industry Makes Its Case

By MICHAEL M. GRYNBAUM

Beachgoers who flocked to the Rockaways and Coney Island on the Fourth of July were able to wash down their hot dogs with any size sugary drinks they desired.

But an airborne banner carried above the city'sbeachesdelivered a succinct message that those carefree days could be coming to an end: "NO DRINK 4 U."

The text-friendly banner, dragged by a tiny prop plane, came courtesy of New Yorkers for Beverage Choices, a group created by the American soft-drink industry to fight Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg's proposal to restrict sales of large sodas in New York City.

And some New Yorkers who spent the holiday indoors at movie theaters came across the same sentiment.

At a theater in Battery Park City, ushers, ticket-takers and concession workers wore industry T-shirts bearing the message, "I picked out my beverage all by myself." An advertisement that ran before some previews warned that the ban would be an infringement on "freedom of choice."

And on the marquee outside the United Artists theater in Brooklyn Heights, alongside movie titles like "Prometheus" and "Brave" was a political call to arms: "Say No to the N.Y.C. Ban."

The efforts, coordinated by the soft-drink industry and several national movie theater chains, may be only the first steps of what is expected to be a major public relations campaign against the ban. The city's Board of Health will decide, after a public hearing on July 24, whether to approve the proposal.

Robert Sunshine, a lobbyist for the movie theater industry inNew York State, said that while his clients agreed thatobesitywas an epidemic, "we believe it should be handled through education."

"No one," he added, "should be told what they can do and what they can't do."

Mr. Bloomberg's camp, for its part, did not sound impressed by the latest criticism. The city says it wants to cut down on consumption of a product that contributes to high obesity rates in the city, and a mayoral spokesman, Stu Loeser, said the Board of Health would base its decision on public policy alone.

"The board is designed not to be subject to political pressure," Mr. Loeser said. "It's designed to make decisions about public health based on science."

Sales of soda, along with other concessions, are a big source of revenue for movie theaters. Those operated by Regal Cinemas and AMC Entertainment in the city are participating in the effort; the smallest size soda available at their theaters is 32 ounces, double the limit proposed by Mr. Bloomberg.

At the theater in Brooklyn Heights, which is operated by Regal, some moviegoers said they had been approached to sign petitions against the mayor's plan. On Thursday, a woman with a coupon for a free 32-ounce soda was offered the chance to upgrade to the large size, 54 ounces, for an extra dollar. She accepted.

A spokesman for AMC, Ryan Noonan, said the company's theaters would allow industry petitioners to speak with patrons; the theaters also planned to distribute information cards and to display posters about their opposition to the ban. "We are bewildered by the proposal to choose an ineffective gimmick to address a critical health issue," Mr. Noonan said.

As for the airborne banner over Coney Island, Eliot Hoff, a spokesman for New Yorkers for Beverage Choices, said beachgoers could expect to see the same message over the weekend, and possibly longer. "It is an efficient and exciting way for the coalition to get the word out to New Yorkers," he wrote in an e-mail.

New York soda ban won't work, marketing experts say

June 04, 2012 | By Mary MacVean

Comedian Jon Stewart drank from an oversized soda cup on his show as he bemoaned the New York City mayor's plan to ban the sale of super-sized sodas from ballparks and other thirst-inducing places. And, Stewart complained, the proposal did what little else could – got him to agree with conservatives.

In fact, Mayor Michael Bloomberg's idea to ban the sale of sugary drinks (not juices or milkshakes) over 16 ounces from sports arenas, restaurants and other spots has many people complaining about the nanny state. Others say it just won't work and that it targets poor people.

No one wants to be targeted, and the reaction to being told what soft drinks they can buy will probably backfire, says David Just, a professor and food marketing specialist at Cornell University's Charles H. Dyson School of Applied Economics and Management.

"It's so unpopular before it even starts, this won't even get a fair shake," Just says.

"Whenever people feel like they're being restricted they begin to resist. And that creates a real headwind for a policy like this," he said Saturday by phone.

One possible result is that soda fans will say: "I'll show them; I'll drink three sodas," Just says.

His colleague, Brian Wansink, also criticized the ban, which would take effect next March.

"People buying super-sized sodas want their 32-ounce soft drinks and will find a work-around to the ban. They'll go to a place that offers fountain refills, or they'll buy two," Wansink said in a statement.

Underlying Bloomberg's idea and other efforts to combat obesity is a frustration that's shared by experts and policymakers, Just says.

A third of Americans are obese, and the costs of attendant ailments such as heart disease and diabetes are enormous. Weight has been an intractable problem – even if people manage to lose excess weight, keeping it off rarely happens over the long term. Many efforts are being targeted at children with the goal of keeping them from becoming overweight in the first place.

Bloomberg has long crusaded to get people to change behaviors to improve their health, targeting foods and smoking, and adding bike lanes.

Plenty of people have spoken out against the mayor's ideas, but the president of the California Endowment, a health foundation, says the soda ban proposal doesn't go far enough.

"We need to move Mayor Bloomberg's effort beyond the five boroughs to all 50 states. Junk drinks are a leading cause of an obesity and excess weight crisis that affects nearly one of every three kids in the United States and half of all kids in poor, rural areas," Robert Ross said in a statement.

Just says he understands the motivations.

"Because of the political pressure to do something -- and really anything – about obesity, we are trying to throw in a bunch of policies that are not proven," Just says.

He used as an example the elimination of chocolate milk from schools in the Los Angeles Unified School District. "If we start to rack up enough of these, there's not going to be the political will to try something that's wildly unpopular."

In addition, the people who buy the most soda are generally poorer, and a ban could feel like it's targeting a particular class of people, Just says.

Instead, he says, coming up with inducements would be a better approach. Work with industry and retailers, he suggests. One idea might be to offer a consumer who buys one soda the same size diet soda at a discount, Just says.

Salt Is Good For You?

Ronald Bailey | June 4, 2012

The attack on sugary sodas is just the latest salvo in NYC Mayor and Nanny-in-Chief Michael Bloomberg's bland food assault. Two years ago, his target was salt - advocating a 25 percent cut in salt in packaged and restaurant foods to be implemented over the next five years. In Sunday's New York Times, health science reporter Gary Taubes has an excellent op/ed exposing how anti-salt campaigners ignore the accumulating scientific evidence that eating salt is not a huge public health problem. Taubes notes that even as far back as 1998 the evidence that current levels of salt consumption was unhealthful was equivocal at best. Now he reports:

> While, back then, the evidence merely failed to demonstrate that salt was harmful, the evidence from studies published over the past two years actually suggests that restricting how much salt we eat can increase our likelihood of dying prematurely. Put simply, the possibility has been raised that if we were to eat as little salt as the U.S.D.A. and the C.D.C. recommend, we'd be harming rather than helping ourselves....
> The idea that eating less salt can worsen health outcomes may sound bizarre, but it also has biological plausibility and is celebrating its 40th anniversary this year, too. A 1972 paper in The New England Journal of Medicine reported that the less salt people ate, the higher their levels of a substance secreted by the kidneys, called renin, which set off a physiological cascade of events that seemed to end with an increased risk of heart disease. In this scenario: eat less salt, secrete more renin, get heart disease, die prematurely.
> With nearly everyone focused on the supposed benefits of salt restriction, little research was done to look at the potential dangers. But four years ago, Italian > researchers began publishing the results from a series of clinical trials, all of which reported that, among patients with heart failure, reducing salt consumption increased the risk of death.

> Those trials have been followed by a slew of studies suggesting that reducing sodium to anything like what government policy refers to as a "safe upper limit" is likely to do more harm than good. These covered some 100,000 people in more than 30 countries and showed that salt consumption is remarkably stable among populations over time. In the United States, for instance, it has remained constant for the last 50 years, despite 40 years of the eat-less-salt message. The average salt intake in these populations— what could be called the normal salt intake — was one and a half teaspoons a day, almost 50 percent above what federal agencies consider a safe upper limit for healthy Americans under 50, and more than double what the policy advises for those who aren't so young or healthy. This consistency, between populations and over time, suggests that how much salt we eat is determined by physiological demands, not diet choices.
> One could still argue that all these people should reduce their salt intake to prevent hypertension, except for the fact that four of these studies — involving Type 1 diabetics, Type 2 diabetics, healthy Europeans and patients with chronic heart failure —reported that the people eating salt at the lower limit of normal were more likely to have heart disease than those eating smack in the middle of the normal range. Effectively what the 1972 paper would have predicted.
> Proponents of the eat-less-salt campaign tend to deal with this contradictory evidence by implying that anyone raising it is a shill for the food industry and doesn't care about saving lives. An N.I.H. administrator told me back in 1998 that to publicly question the science on salt was to play into the hands of the industry. "As long as there are things in the media that say the salt controversy continues," he said, "they win."

How dare Taubes challenge a "scientific consensus"!

Banned! Bloomberg Flushes Big Soda in New York

by Juli Weiner 9:18 AM, MAY 31 2012

MARLITH/WIKIPEDIA.

New York City mayor Michael Bloomberg is taking on his most carbonated enemy yet: Big Soda. The New York Times reports that Bloomie—who's already outlawed cigarettes, transfats, and non-awkward photos with Mr. Met—is proposing a ban the "sale of any cup or bottle of sweetened drink larger than 16 fluid ounces." But wait! There are just as many exceptions to this rule as their are grams of sugar in a typical sweetened drink larger than 16 fluid ounces.

The exceptions:

- "The measure would not apply to diet sodas, fruit juices, dairy-based drinks like milkshakes, or alcoholic beverages"
- "it would not extend to beverages sold in grocery or convenience stores"
- "The ban would not apply to drinks with fewer than 25 calories per 8-ounce serving, like zero-calorie Vitamin Waters and unsweetened iced teas, as well as diet sodas."
- The ban would not affect "vending machines or newsstands that serve only a smattering of fresh food items"
- "Corner stores and bodegas would be affected if they are defined by the city as 'food service establishments.'"

Your days in New York are numbered, 17 oz., high-calorie, non-fruit, non-dairy, non-alcoholic drinks sold in 'food service establishments' other than grocery stores, convenience stores, vending machines, newsstands, and certain corner stores and bodegas.

Big Gulp March

By: Zack Fink

Opponents of Mayor Michael Bloomberg's soda ban took to the streets, saying it goes too far in trying to regulate people's choices. Bloomberg wants New York City restaurants to stop serving sodas and other sugary drinks bigger than 16 ounces, claiming they contribute to obesity. Zack Fink has the story.

Like 1

NEW YORK CITY, N.Y. -- Claiming they have no ties to the powerful beverage industry, New Yorkers rallied for what they say is a personal liberty.

"As Americans in a free society, we need to have choices. And it's up to people to take personal responsibility for themselves, not for the nanny state to dictate," said Danny Panzella of the State Island Libertarian Party.

Last month, the city's board of health took the first step toward banning sugary drinks over 16 ounces. The prohibition would apply to stadiums, movie theaters restaurants and some stores.

"I don't believe that it's Mayor Bloomberg's or the government's responsibility to tell us if we can have salt on the table, what we drink and what we eat," said Andrea Hebert.

For his part, Mayor Bloomberg claims that the city must do what it can to combat rising health care costs due to obesity. He says roughly 34 percent of New Yorkers are overweight and 22 percent are obese. The mayor saw no humor in the rally being dubbed the "Big Gulp March."

"In New York City alone, we're going to spend $4 billion of your money to treat obesity related diseases. It's a $100 plus million, billion, dollars across the country and skyrocketing. We just have to do something about it and if somebody wants to have a march, I suppose it's funny, but it is so tragic what is happening I have to say the humor kind of escapes me," Bloomberg said.

Organizers of the rally say the mayor is being hypocritical.

"Hey, you go to National Donut Day, you go and me eating 68 consecutive hot dogs and endorse this kind of stuff, then you come over and tell us 20 ounces is too much," organizer Zach Huff said.

Some elected officials argue that the ban, which does not include convenience or grocery stores, is too selective.

"You could have a 7-11 next to a bodega. The bodega is banned, the 7-11 is not. There is a question as to whether or not Starbucks is permitted to sell sugary sodas and if it's a supermarket, they are exempt as well. So the arbitrariness of this really bothers me," City Council Member Letitia James said.

There is a public hearing later this month. A final vote could take place in September and that would put the ban into effect by next March.

'Million Big Gulp March' protests NYC big-drink ban

July 9, 2012 by MARIA ALVAREZ. Special to Newsday

A group of protesters clutching signs and giant sodas voiced their opposition Monday to Mayor Michael Bloomberg's proposed ban on large sugary drinks.

The "Million Big Gulp March" drew dozens of people near City Hall to express their opposition to the mayor's quest to impose a 16-ounce limit on sugary drinks sold at restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, delis and street carts.

The proposal, the latest measure pushed by Bloomberg in a battle against rising obesity, does not apply to drinks sold in grocery or convenience stores, such as 7-Elevens, which are regulated by the state. Violators of the ban -- which would apply to bottled drinks as well as fountain sodas -- could face fines up to $200.

The protest was organized by NYC Liberty HQ, a group of volunteers not funded by special interests, according to Zach Huff, the organization's spokesman.

One protester, Andrea Hebert, 55, of Manhattan, carried a 7-Eleven Big Gulp in one hand and a sign in the other that read "Bloomberg = Nanny State" on one side and "Nanny Bloomberg, stay out of our kitchens!" on the other.

"The mayor is wasting our time and wasting our tax money," said Hebert, a sales director. "It's not his job to tell us what to eat and drink."

The protest also attracted local politicians, including City Councilman and Republican nominee for Congress Daniel Halloran, who expressed anger that the ban does not need City Council approval. "Again the people don't have a say," he said. If the mayor wants to combat obesity, Halloran said, he should "make gym a required course for kids" and "build more baseball fields and soccer fields."

Huff said organizers and supporters represent a variety of political and social backgrounds, from "conservatives, libertarians to Democrats. "We are young and old and believe that the government needs to go back to their job, which is to protect people's individual rights."

The mayor's proposal has garnered the support from health insurance companies and professional medical associations, such as the American Academy of Pediatrics.

Even celebrities are weighing in on the ban: Filmmaker and Brooklyn native Spike Lee told New York magazine recently he's in favor of the proposal.

The city's Department of Health unanimously passed the proposal last month and has scheduled a public hearing for July 24, with a final vote in September. If approved, the ban would take effect in March.

Mayor Bloomberg's Sweet Sugary Nanny State

Posted By David Boaz On May 31, 2012 @ 11:52 am In General,Government and Politics | Comments Disabled

"A spoonful of sugar helps the medicine go down," sang a legendary nanny. But today's most powerful nanny, New York mayor Michael Bloomberg, won't tolerate that. He plans to ban the sale of large sodas and other sugary drinks at restaurants, movie theaters, and even street carts, the New York Times reports [1].

Mayor Bloomberg has lots of facts at his fingertips: Many Americans are overweight. Consumption of sugar can cause weight gain. All true, and a good reason for Mike Bloomberg to watch his diet.

But why should he watch MY diet? And the diets of 8 million New Yorkers, most of them adults? If he thinks New Yorkers should consume less sugar, let him hold a press conference. But giving people information isn't good enough for him. Sometimes he gives people information, and they still don't act the way he thinks they should So what's a billionaire mayor to do? He could bribe them, I suppose. But as Otter said [2], that could take years and cost millions of lives. Well, millions of dollars anyway. So, like Otter, he's decided to go with "a really futile and stupid gesture" instead.

When he's in the mood, Mayor Bloomberg can give eloquent testimony to the virtue of freedom when it comes to Muslims [3] _

> America is a beacon of freedom, and no place defends those freedoms more fervently, or has been attacked for those freedoms more ferociously, than New York City.

– or gay people [4]:

> I have no doubt that in your lifetime, liberty's light will allow us to see more clearly the truth of our nation's founding principles, and allow us to see all people, and all couples, as full and equal members of the American family....If government can deny freedom to one, it can deny freedom to all.

But somehow when it's the mayor's own sensibilities that are offended, he forgets his eloquent defense of freedom. Suddenly, as White House chief of staff Andrew Card said [5] of President Bush, Bloomberg "sees America as we think about a 10-year-old child." A child who needs protection. A child who can't make his own decisions. A child who needs a parent, or a nanny, to tell him what to eat and when to exercise.

In a free society, government doesn't make our personal decisions for us. We don't need a Big Brother or a mayoral nanny. We have the right and the responsibility to make our own decisions, so long as we don't interfere with the rights of others. And even if we make what Mayor Bloomberg views as the wrong decisions.

And speaking of the mayor's commitment to freedom, who exactly is going to impose this sweeping ban? Not the people, in a referendum. Not a constitutional convention. Not even the city council. This "far-reaching ban," as the Times describes it, will be imposed on 8 million free citizens of New York by the city's unelected Board of Health, all of whose members are appointed by . . . the mayor.

Sugar shock: Should your sweet tooth be regulated?

By Elizabeth Ward, USA TODAY

Last week, the journal Nature published an article called "Public health: The toxic truth about sugar."

The authors argue that all forms of added sugar, including table sugar and high fructose corn syrup, are as harmful to health as alcohol and tobacco, and should be regulated to decrease the risk of chronic illness.

The sugar that occurs naturally in foods such as milk, 100% juice and fresh and dried fruits like dates, figs and raisins, is not considered a health risk, however.

CAPTION
By Dario Pignatelli, Bloomberg

There's no question that added sugar consumption is out of hand for some people. On average, Americans eat 297 cups of the stuff every year, according to the United States Department of Agriculture. The American Heart Association says people who follow a 2200-calorie diet should limit sugar intake to about 68 cups yearly.

Clearly, there's room for improvement.

Foods rich in added sugar, like cookies, cake and regular soda, crowd out more nutritious choices, such as fruit and whole grains.

Like protein and fat, added sugar contributes calories that could complicate weight control efforts. Excess body fat is linked to a greater chance for type 2 diabetes, heart disease, certain cancers and other conditions.

Robert H. Lustig, MD, the lead author of the Nature study, argues that excessive sugar is linked to health problems, including high blood pressure, elevated triglycerides (fat in the blood) and liver problems, even in those with a healthy weight.

Eating less sugar makes sense for a lot of people. But is regulating sugar worth it? I doubt it -- at least not the way Lustig and his colleagues imagine: hefty taxes on sugary foods, such as regular soda; limiting the availability of sugary foods; and setting a minimum age for purchasing sugary foods and beverages, much the way states regulate the purchase of alcohol and tobacco.

As a dietitian, I spend my time trying to get people to eat better. Yet, even I bristle at legislating sugar intake, and I'm not the only one. Brian Wansink, PhD, is the founder and director of the Cornell Food and Brand Lab and author of Mindless Eating: Why We Eat More Than We Think.

"Restrictions on behavior often lead to unintended consequences," he says.

Like more regulation.

"First, we restrict sugar. Next, we could be taxing fat in foods or meat, or restricting access to them some other way. There's really no end in sight," Wansink says.

Taxing sugar sends the wrong message, says Rosanne Rust, MS, RD, author of Glycemic Index Cookbook For Dummies. "It's almost like a penalty for those who work hard to maintain healthy habits."

It's one thing to control the sale and use of alcohol and tobacco. It's quite another to limit sugar.

We must eat to live and the foods we prefer, even occasionally and as part of a healthy lifestyle, may contain added sugar. We don't need cigarettes and cocktails to survive, however.

"There is room for some sugar in the diet, and I don't want to live without it," says Rust. "I've raised my three children to eat a balanced diet, which does include baked goods, some candy and soft drinks, but not daily."

Here's how I'd prefer to deal with sugar overload:

• Educate people about a balanced diet and the role that added sugar plays in healthy eating.

• Provide lower-sugar options at the supermarket.

• Have the Food and Drug Administration require food manufacturers to list added sugars listed on the Nutrient Facts panel.

What do you think about controlling the added sugar in our food supply?

Bloomberg Insists His Plan to Limit New Yorkers' Soda Sizes Cannot Possibly Work

Jacob Sullum | May 31, 2012

Defending his proposal to fight obesity by restricting soft drink sizes, New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg says, "I think that's what the public wants the mayor to do." If the public wanted it, of course, there would be no need for the government to require it. Bloomberg's plan makes sense only to the extent that it changes consumers' decisions by limiting their options—specifically, by decreeing that restaurants, food carts, movie theaters, and concession stands at sports arenas may not sell more than 16 ounces of most sugar-sweetened beverages in one cup or bottle. Yet The New York Times reports that Bloomberg cast doubt on the rationale for this rule right out of the gate:

> The mayor, who said he occasionally drank a diet soda "on a hot day," contested the idea that the plan would limit consumers' choices, saying the option to buy more soda would always be available.
> "Your argument, I guess, could be that it's a little less convenient to have to carry two 16-ounce drinks to your seat in the movie theater rather than one 32 ounce," Mr. Bloomberg said in a sarcastic tone. "I don't think you can make the case that we're taking things away."

If so, what's the point? If the added inconvenience of carrying two containers does not deter people from drinking as much soda as they otherwise would, how can Bloomberg possibly claim his restrictions will make people thinner?

The answer is that Bloomberg and his health commissioner, Thomas Farley, say whatever pops into their heads, without regard to logic or evidence. Consider:

> In New York City, where more than half of adults are obese or overweight, Dr. Thomas Farley, the health commissioner, blames sweetened drinks for up to half of the increase in city obesity rates over the last 30 years. About a third of New Yorkers drink one or more sugary drinks a day, according to the city. Dr. Farley said the city had seen higher obesity rates in neighborhoods where soda consumption was more common.

Correlation = causation. QED. If that is the quality of Farley's science, perhaps we should not ask how he came up with the estimate that sweetened drinks account for "up to half" of the increase in obesity rates since the early 1980s. That statement, after all, is consistent with the possibility that sweetened drinks account for none of the increase.

Even if we accept Farley's claims about soda's role in rising obesity rates, it does not follow that Bloomberg's plan will have a measurable impact on New Yorkers' waistlines. There are reasons to doubt that it will, starting with the mayor's observation that extra-thirsty customers can always buy another 16-ounce drink (which might actually result in the consumption of more calories, assuming their usual serving is between 16 and 32 ounces). Nor will undercover health inspectors monitor the city's fast food restaurants to prevent diners from availing themselves of free refills; the regulations graciously let them drink as much soda as they want, as long as they do it 16 ounces at a time. The size rule does not apply at all to convenience stores, supermarkets, or vending machines, so Big Gulps, giant Slurpees, and large bottles of soda will still be readily available. Bloomberg also plans to exempt fruit juices, which typically have more calories per ounce than sugar-sweetened soda, and milk-based drinks. So while New Yorkers won't be allowed to order 20 ounces of Coke (240 calories), they will still be able to get a 20-ounce Starbucks whole-milk latte (290 calories) or even a 24-ounce Double Chocolaty Frappuccino (520 calories), not to mention a 20-ounce milkshake (about 800 calories).

In other words, Bloomberg is right when he says there will still be lots of opportunities for New Yorkers to consume large quantities of high-calorie drinks, which means he does not even have a sound paternalistic justification for his meddling. He is screwing with people not to protect them from their own foolish choices but just to create the appearance of doing so. Or maybe just because he can.

The Times notes that Bloomberg "has made public health one of the top priorities of his lengthy tenure" with "a series of aggressive regulations," including "bans on smoking in restaurants and parks" and "a prohibition against artificial trans fat in restaurant food." It adds that "the measures have led to occasional derision of the mayor as Nanny Bloomberg, by those who view the restrictions as infringements on personal freedom." Is there any other reasonable way to view such restrictions? It is one thing to argue (as Bloomberg presumably would) that the restrictions are justified by the government's supposed duty to minimize morbidity and mortality by preventing people from taking risks (its "highest duty," according to Bloomberg). But it is patently absurd for Bloomberg to claim he is not limiting freedom when he uses force to stop people from doing something that violate no one's rights, whether it's selling donuts fried in trans fat, lighting up in a bar whose owner has chosen to allow smoking on his own property, or ordering a 20-ounce soda in a deli. When, as in this case, his arrogant, healthier-than-thou interference has, by his own admission, zero chance of achieving its stated goal, that fact hardly makes his arbitrary use of government power less objectionable.

NYC Mayor Will Eat Away Our Freedoms with Beverage Ban

May 31, 2012 by Stephen Richer

(http://wlflegalpulse.files.wordpress.com/2012/05/sodaban.jpg)Trans-fats – we were told by New York City Mayor Bloomberg – are an exceptional case because even the smallest intake hurts the human body. Ditto, it would seem, of salt (http://newyork.grubstreet.com/2010/01/bloombergs_war_on_salt_whos_fo.html) and alcohol (http://nymag.com/daily/intel/2012/01/bloombergs-health-initiatives-target-alcohol.html). But we all knew he wouldn't stop there.

And he didn't. The New York Times reported yesterday (http://www.nytimes.com/2012/05/31/nyregion/bloomberg-plans-a-ban-on-large-sugared-drinks.html?pagewanted=1&emc=na) that Mayor Bloomberg now has fixed his paternalistic gaze on "Big Soda":

> New York City plans to enact a far-reaching ban on the sale of large sodas and other sugary drinks at restaurants, movie theaters and street carts, in the most ambitious effort yet by the Bloomberg administration (http://topics.nytimes.com/top/reference/timestopics/people/b/michael_r_bloomberg/index.html?inline=nyt-per) to combat rising obesity (http://health.nytimes.com/health/guides/symptoms/morbid-obesity/overview.html?inline=nyt-classifier).
> The proposed ban would affect virtually the entire menu of popular sugary drinks found in delis, fast-food franchises and even sports arenas, from energy drinks to pre-sweetened iced teas. The sale of any cup or bottle of sweetened drink larger than 16 fluid ounces — about the size of a medium coffee, and smaller than a common soda bottle — would be prohibited under the first-in-the-nation plan, which could take effect as soon as next March."

Here are some initial problems we see with the proposal:

Slippery Slope!

As implied above, the mayor is on the fast track down a slippery slope. How many more "exceptional" products are there going to be? Will French fries be next? Cupcakes of a certain size?

Individual autonomy?

We Americans haven't always made the right decisions, but we've always firmly believed in the freedom to make our own decisions – even ones that might be considered "bad".

Good public policy?

Vanity Fair's Julie Weiner notes (http://www.vanityfair.com/online/daily/2012/05/bloomberg-bans-soda-new-york) that there are so many exceptions to Bloomberg's proposed new law that anyone who wants a sugary soda or a sports drink will still be able to get one – it will just a be a bit more of a hassle. We've established that the proposed ban will shrink our freedoms. But will it really shrink our waistlines? Won't people just go for more refills at the soda machine or order two talls instead of a venti?

Equality under the law?

One of the hallmarks of American law is that all persons and companies – no matter what their religion, race, social standing, economic position, or otherwise – are treated equally under the law. This proposed soda ban, however, blames American obesity on soda even though it is arguably a combination of many foods and beverages, genetics, lack of exercise, etc. Why is it the soda industry that gets punished?

Also, the proposed ban on certain beverages is at once overinclusive and underinclusive. Some vendors are exempt from the ban. Others, like movie theaters, are not, and will undoubtedly see a drop in their profits.

Are sugary drinks really the problem?

Are we even that sure on the science behind the "soda as primary obesity causer" theory? You'll hopefully forgive us for being a bit skeptical of Mayor Bloomberg's assertion. It was his Health Department, after all, that falsely Photoshopped (http://nymag.com/daily/intel/2012/01/nyc-amputation-ad-was-photoshopped.html) an advertisement to suggest that soda had caused a man to require amputation of both of his legs.

Fortunately, we're far from the only ones who think the mayor's proposal is a terrible idea. Twitter is already abuzz with criticism of the proposal. I'll leave with you some good ones (hat tip Twitchy.com), and the hope that you'll join the campaign to throw up Mayor Bloomberg's latest proposal to dictate our individual eating habits.

Bloomberg's paternalism

Civilising thirst

Jun 4th 2012, 18:35 by W.W. | IOWA CITY

GIGANTIC sugared soft drinks are disgusting. Let's just get that out of the way. Can we also agree that the high-calorie drinks rich people like to consume—red wine, artisanal beer, caramel frappuccinos, mango smoothies with wheatgrass and a protein boost—aren't at all disgusting? At any rate, we yuppie pinot-drinkers know how to look after ourselves. In contrast, the wretched classless hordes, many of them being of dubious heritage, lack the refinement of taste necessary to make autonomy unobjectionable. Those who abuse their liberty, filling the sidewalks of our great cities with repulsive shuffling blimps, can't expect to keep it, can they? Nevertheless, Michael Bloomberg's proposal to ban the sale of sodas larger than 16 ounces in the restaurants and at food carts of New York City, of which Mr Bloomberg is mayor, has met with a cool reception (http://campaign2012.washingtonexaminer.com/blogs/beltway-confidential/bloomberg-soda-ban-more-unpopular-putin/577676) , which he finds "ridiculous" (http://www.reuters.com/article/2012/06/01/us-usa-sugarban-newyork-idUSBRE85012N20120601) .

"More than half of NYC adults (58%) are overweight or obese," Mr Bloomberg tweeted (http://www.google.com/url?sa=t&rct=j&q=&esrc=s&source=web&cd=1&ved=0CEsQFjAA&url=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.cnn.com%2F2012%2F05%2F31%2Fus%2Fnew-york-sugar-drinks%2Findex.html&ei=cuPMT72eGqmw2wW7tcS6DA&usg=AFQjCNFrZUKWYDiH8MXDs19zQl0xYYOkUQ&sig2=i71_6 "We're doing something about it." And it's about time! In defence of his brave proposal, Mr Bloomberg cites studies (http://www.usatoday.com/news/opinion/editorials/story/2012-06-03/sugary-drinks-Michael-Bloomberg/55366444/1) that indicate that "The increase in sugary drink consumption is the largest single cause of the rise in calories in the American diet in the last 40 years. Many studies show consumption of these beverages is linked to weight gain and obesity, and more recently, diabetes and heart disease."

But that's not all science has to say on the matter. The most comprehensive meta-analysis to date (http://www.ajcn.org/content/87/6/1662.abstract) of the relationship between the consumption of sugary drinks and body mass index in children and adolescents "found that the association between [sugared beverage] consumption and BMI was near zero, based on the current body of scientific evidence". Scott Lemieux cites other studies (http://www.lawyersgunsmoneyblog.com/2012/06/nanny-state-authoritarianism-of-the-day) indicating that carbonated soft-drink consumption is declining anyway. I see nothing, however, to rebut the proposition that it is most revolting to swill a tankard of Mr Pibb.

Perhaps it should not be surprising that that science is not exactly stable. Ronald Bailey of Reason reminds us (http://reason.com/blog/2012/06/04/salt-is-good-for-you) that, in 2010, Mr Bloomberg pushed for (http://www.bloomberg.com/apps/news?pid=newsarchive&sid=aDv_NovKZYoU) "a 25 percent cut in salt in packaged and restaurant foods to be implemented over the next five years". But just yesterday, Gary Taubes reported in the New York Times that the scientific evidence for the unhealthiness of salt is rather scant. In fact, consuming less sodium could do a body harm:

> "Italian researchers began publishing the results from a series of clinical trials, all of which reported that, among patients with heart failure, reducing salt consumption increased the risk of death.
> Those trials have been followed by a slew of studies suggesting that reducing sodium to anything like what government policy refers to as a "safe upper limit" is likely to do more harm than good."

This is not to suggest that mainlining Mountain Dew has no ill effects, only that it may be too early to make a sound scientific case for this sort of soft paternalism. Better, then, to stick with the unimpeachable argument that imbibing vats of soda pop is a disgusting, low-born abuse of liberty not to be tolerated by a civilised people. As Brian Wansink and David Just, behavioural economists at Cornell, ask (http://www.usnews.com/debate-club/should-the-sale-of-large-sugary-drinks-be-prohibited/soda-ban-will-fail-and-jeopardize-future-public-health-efforts) , "Who buys large soft drinks?"

> "It's not just the individuals who may have some disregard for their weight. It may also be the construction worker who buys a single drink and nurses it all day. It may be the family of three who decide to split a single drink to save money. Soft drinks are bought by one third of the poorest 2 million New Yorkers but only one sixth of the richest 1 million—those who prefer to sip their fruit smoothies and lattes without regard for the burden on the less affluent soda drinkers."

Incredibly, Messrs Wansink and Just oppose the big-soda ban anyway. If hassling the rabble for their vulgar taste in drinks doesn't have the desired effect, we could always try smoothie vouchers. Or, as I've suggested before (http://www.economist.com/node/21524522) , we can eliminate all this arbitrary, low-level meddling, cut straight to the chase, and directly tax people for being too fat.

Harlem Small Businesses Rail Against Bloomberg's Sugary Drink Ban

HARLEM — Lal Barak, owner of Crown Fried Chicken at Lexington Avenue and East 116th Street, says he wouldn't have such a problem with Mayor Michael Bloomberg's proposed big soda ban if his business wasn't sandwiched between two bodegas.

Under the plan, the corner stores would still be able to sell 2 -liter sweetened beverages because they are classified as grocery establishments, while individual stores like Barak's would be barred from doing so.

"If a customer comes here and asks for a bottle of soda and I can't sell it here, they are just going to go next door," said Barak. "This is going to hurt my business."

Barak raised his concerns with East Harlem Councilwoman Melissa Mark-Viverito as part of a brief walking tour sponsored by the American Beverage Association, a lobbying group for makers and distributors of non-alcoholic beverages, which, along with the councilwoman, opposes the ban.

The group has launched a media blitz against the plan.

"Our freedom of choice is being restricted," said Vanessa Pino Lockel, New York City director of the American Beverage Association.

Mark-Viverito said Bloomberg's ban was "sound-bite public policy" and would be too onerous to enforce while drawing attention away from issues that could more forcefully impact the health of her constituents in East Harlem and the South Bronx who suffer from high rates of obesity and related diseases such as diabetes.

According to a city study, six of every 10 adults in East and Central Harlem are overweight or obese. East Harlem is also classified as a food desert. Only 3 percent of bodegas carry fresh, leafy green vegetables compared to 30 percent on the Upper East Side.

"This is just a distraction. It doesn't get at the root of the issue," said Mark-Viverito, who added she doesn't support the consumption of large quantities of soda.

Starting young is the best way to change people's attitudes toward health, Mark-Viverito said.

Enforcing the mandatory requirement for physical education in public schools and increasing access to fresh, healthy foods are good places to start. Mark-Viverito said her strong support of bike lanes in East Harlem shows a commitment to improving residents' health.

"How do we make open space more available? That's difficult and more challenging than this sound-bite policy," said Mark-Viverito, who purchased a diet Coke from Sam's Pizza.
Under the amendment to the city's health code, establishments such as restaurants, fast-food joints, delis, movie theaters, sports stadiums and food carts could not sell sugary drinks larger than 16 ounces. The ban would cover soda, fountain drinks and teas at any location that receives a letter grade from the city's Department of Health.

Excluded are grocery establishments and diet drinks and teas with fewer than 25 calories per 8 ounces. Drinks that contain at least 70-percent fruit or vegetable juice, alcoholic beverages and dairy-based drinks such as milkshakes were also exempted.

Bloomberg has said the measure is a proactive step in addressing the country's growing obesity problem.

"In New York City nearly 60 percent of adults and nearly 40 percent of children are overweight or obese and there are real-world consequences," Bloomberg, who has also pushed limits on smoking in public and the amount of trans fats in foods, said in a statement.

"Obesity is the only major public health issue we have that is getting worse and New York City has the courage to stand up and do something about it."

A recent Quinnipiac University poll found that 51 percent of New York City voters were opposed to the plan. Manhattan residents showed the highest level of support with 55 percent backing the ban.

The Board of Health voted to move forward with the plan last month. A public hearing will be held on July 24.

Javier Lopez, director of the NYC Strategic Alliance for Health, praised Bloomberg as being progressive on issues of public health but felt this most recent effort was misguided.

"This should not be the most prominent issue regarding public health in New York City right now," Lopez said.

"People understand that soda and fast food is not good but we haven't gotten the individual freedom aspect to connect to public health. We need to focus on food access and creating an equitable environment across the board."

Henry Calderon, chairman of the East Harlem Chamber of Commerce, said the ban is uneven and would hurt local stores such as Sam's Famous Pizza on the corner of 116th Street and Lexington Avenue that offer food and drink specials to attract customers.

"If you want to talk about health then no one should be allowed to sell drinks over 16 ounces," said Calderon. "What we should be spending our money on is education and health literacy so people understand what it means to drink a super-sized soda."

Dimitrios Alexiou, manager of Sam's Pizza, said he's providing goods the public wants. Often when he offers the 12-ounce fountain soda with a pizza special, customers say it's too small.

"I don't even drink soda but other people are never going to stop. My wife buys the 2 liters of soda," he said. "They are going to buy it from somewhere."

7-Eleven invades New York City

AMANDA BARKER
27 June 2012 02:48

Run! The flood is coming – the flood of 7-Elevens, that is.

The oft-maligned chain store has plans to greatly expand in New York City — much to the chagrin of some small-business owners.

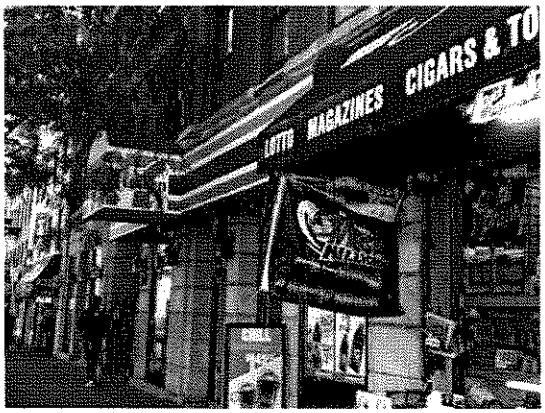
According to Margaret Chabris, the director of public relations at 7-Eleven Inc., the corporation plans for 30 new locations scheduled to open in the city in 2012, and plans to grow to 135 stores by 2017, she said.

"Our experience in New York City over the past several decades has shown that we contribute significantly to the neighborhoods we join," she said. "That is why we have targeted growth here."

But those who own and work at stores nearby would beg to differ.

The manager of Gramercy Corner, located next door to 7-Eleven on 3rd Avenue and East 20th Street, said that 7-Eleven has taken 40 percent of his convenient store's business.

"7-Elevens are not made for New York because they are killing the small businesses that New Yorkers have always gone to," said Amjad, 30, who declined to give his last name. "They are selling the same things that mom-and-pop stores sell, but people go to them because they're a big corporation."



Amanda Barker/Metro
Those near the 7-Eleven on Third Avenue in Gramercy complain the chain drives out small businesses.

The frustration doesn't end in Gramercy.

Shailyn T. is a 21-year-old barista for Eastside Bakery, located next to the 7-Eleven on St. Mark's Place. She said the building that houses the bakery has hosted several businesses before it, including a pizza parlor and a restaurant. But nothing ever survives.

"I have heard people say that it's because of 7-Eleven," she said. "People go there because their stuff is cheaper."

7-Eleven has the soda advantage, too

As 7-Elevens take New York by storm, many may also be surprised to hear that 7-Eleven is also exempt from Mayor Michael Bloomberg's extremely controversial soda ban proposal.

Bloomberg's proposal would make it illegal for restaurants, delis, food carts, sports arenas and movie theaters in New York City to sell sodas or sweetened drinks that are bigger than 16 ounces.

Grocery and convenience stores are excluded from the proposed ban, and 7-Eleven counts as a deli.

That means 7-Eleven can keep hawking its infamous Big Gulps, weighing in at 30 ounces of sugary sweet soda for a regular and a whopping 50 ounces of soda in a Double Gulp.

Comment: As a small business owner, I strongly oppose this proposed rule. Our quick serve restaurant currently serves 16 and 20 ounce beverages. While customers often ask for larger sizes, no customer has ever wished we offered a smaller size. We believe our customers can make their own personal choices. I fully believe that if this rule passes, it is only the tip of the iceberg of the City creating more and more regulations at the expense of our business and at the expense of consumer choice in the name of health. Our business will suffer and our customers will find what they are looking for at bodegas or other store exempt from the rule. It is absolutely not the governments role to make personal decisions on behalf of individuals or to create laws restricting free commerce. We might as well be in Nazi Germany, Communist China, or North Korea with the direction we are headed. As a consumer, I also oppose this rule because I believe America was founded on!

individualism and personal accountability, and this is another example of the nanny state jumping in where they have no place. This rule must be voted down; otherwise, it is a sad indictment of our eroding liberties in what was intended by our founders to be free country with a limited government.

Comment:	i agree that establishing a maximum size of 16 ounces for sugary drinks is a great idea. I feel that it would be helpful to have a maximum size that is sold since sugary drinks only have harmfull effects on people. By limiting the size there woud be more positive outcomes.

Comment:	It is misguided and contradictory to ban it in establishments inspected by the Dept. of Health (DOH) when the same size drink bottle can be sold next door in a general merchandise store with impunity. In addition, why is the City attempting to ban soft drinks in RESEALABLE BOTTLES? The invention of the resealable bottle cap is the best innovation for drinks - INCLUDING BOTTLED WATER. The main intent of a resealable bottle is you dont have to (and shouldnt) drink it all at once. The mayor is always talking about Moderation. Drinking soft drinks from bottle, resealing it and leaving some for another day IS MODERATION. For this reason, I am against the City banning soft drinks resealable bottles.

Comment: Soft drink portion sizes have grown considerably: in 1955, McDonalds offered a 7oz cup - now its 32oz. Capping the size of drinks sold at restaurants goes a small way to reversing that trend. Of course, if youd like to consume more, youre still free to. The only impediment is the indignity of ordering twice. Predictably, the soda and restaurant industries have howled at the prospect of New Yorkers spending less on lucrative and unhealthy portion sizes. The businesses that profit from poor public health argue that Mayor Bloombergs limits on portion size are an infringement on liberty.

The beverage industry gets it backwards. Those who choose to drink more than 16 oz of soda are just as free to do it as before. But limiting the extent to which the industry can pump their products makes every New Yorker a little freer. By limiting the industrys freedom, this initiative expands the freedom of citizens. As part of a comprehensive strategy for public health, it is a vital step forward.

Comment:	I think it is completely unfair that the government in any way should control how many ounces a person should be limited to drink. It should be left to the consumer what size drink he should buy. Why does his freedom of choice have to be eliminated? I am completely against this proposal

State:	NY

Comment:	Good afternoon.

My name is Arva Rice, and I am President and CEO of the New York Urban League.

As the leader of a historic civil rights organization, we are charged with confronting the injustices and ills facing our community. Theres no denying that obesity is a serious problem for everyone, especially members of our community as rates are especially high among African Americans and other underserved ethnic communities. These communities need real, long-term help to start to bring these rates down.

So I am sympathetic to Mayor Bloombergs and this boards goals. We need well-rounded and robust programs to fight this epidemic. However, we believe that the size restrictions on sugar-sweetened beverages will undermine the rights of individuals to make the most fundamental choices in their own lives and could negatively impact small business owners.

At the New York Urban League, we work hard to empower individuals to take control of their lives and be a force for positive change within their communities. But this proposal will not empower anyone. Mayor Bloombergs own office has contended that there are over three million city residents who live in a food desert - and now these citizens will be virtually unable to purchase many beverages in affordable quantities for their families.

Instead, Mayor Bloomberg is proposing a ban on sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 fluid ounces in any New York City restaurant or store that requires a Department of Health inspection certificate or letter grade. That means some beverages could no longer be available at restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, pizza shops, delis, food trucks and street carts around the city. This ban will not only limited the freedom of individuals but we are also concerned about the adverse impact this ban will have on small business owners and community members.

The answer to the obesity epidemic is to educate and empower these communities and work collaboratively with corporations to ensure healthy exercise programs are available in schools and community centers.

I dont doubt that the administration has good intentions. But intentions aside, the bottom line is that members of underserved communities are being told that they are incapable of looking after themselves and their families and that they must pay a higher price for the right to make their own food choices.

Thank you.

Anyone who wants a sugary drink that is more than proposed, can just buy more thatn one. This rule should apply to every outlet that sells drinks no matter what shape or form, if this is in fact going to be a rule.
Too much control is counter productive
Ridiculous to even consider such rules. You are taking away freedom of choice from citizen.

Comment:	An absolutely ludicrous idea. Whats next, regulate the size of a cheesecake, how many cookies in a box, the height of a womans high heel because she may strain her ankle? Any government that sits in the United States of America has no business regulating personal choice. This is reminiscent of Singapore, or worse, North Korea.

Butt out!!! Thank you. :-)

Comment: Hygiene,	Dear NYC Department of Health and Mental

I'm a healthy, non-diabetic and non-obese person. Frequently during an out door meal, I would purchase a sugary drink that is over 16 ounces. Although the entire sugary drink is always more than what I need for the meal, instead of throwing it away, I would consume the rest of the sugary drink during my walk back to work or home.

The recent proposal on establishing a maximum size of 16 ounces drink to be sold in an eating establishment bothers me. Although I could easily purchase 2 x16 ounces drink rather than 1x 32 ounces while I'm in a eating establishment, I feel the city is trying to put a tax on my daily meal consumption (the cost per ounce on a 32 is cheaper than a 16). Although the price difference is small between a 32 sugary drink versus a 16, adding up the differences everyday for a year and the differences becomes a sizable amount.

If article 81 is passed, there is a way for me to get around the new rule. Instead of buying the sugary drink in an eating establishment, I just have to walk a little further and find a bodega store. In no way would I feel the new rule stop or deter me from obtaining my 32 ounces sugary drink. It's just a little effort on my end. However, I feel the city is putting pressure on eating establishments by limiting the sugary drink sales. The sale of sugary drinks is small amount, but to small eateries, every sales counts and would hurt them in the long run.

If article 81 is meant to solve the obesity problem, I can't figure out how limiting the size of sugary drink to 16 ounces in an eating establishment would in any way help reduce obesity. In my opinion, article 81 creates confusion in people's daily activities and hurts more to eating establishments.

Comment: Even if we we limit the size, does it really help?? Like for my store, the fountain drink refill is free, so when given the 16oz glass, she/he will definitely go again for a refill.

And it should the peoples choice about what they are allowed to do or not. They should use their better judgement against the one being enforced.

What can be done is proposing a standard small sized drink that should be available in all Food Service Establishments, and the people should be informed that there is a smaller choice available. Again it should be the persons choice whether he/she decided to buy the biggest or smallest cups.

Dear Mayor Bloomberg, Members of the Board of Health, Acting Corporation Counsel Steven Goulden and Mayor's Operations Officer Ruby Choi and all interested parties:

Thank you for the notification through the media about this public hearing and our opportunity to participate in rule making in our city. My name is Rivka Freeman. I am a NYS Licensed and Registered Pharmacist and I specialize in teaching nutrition and diabetes education. Every detail about consuming of a diet of balanced meals that manages and maintains health and weight is elaborated on the website www.balancedmeals.org. I am a volunteer compiler, writer and editor of this free nutrition education information and www.balancedmeals.org is a public service of the non profit corporation COPP A LIFE CORP. The reason this non profit corporation was established is because it is extremely difficult to get nutrition or diabetes education through health insurance, especially the consumers in your desired target audience. After the Fat Teens vs McDonald's lawsuit in 2003, New York State established the Childhood Obesity Prevention Program but never funded it, so we established COPP A LIFE CORP in effort to provide public nutrition education that is not available through our healthcare system. Since there is no way for me to make a living through billing health insurance, we made this non profit corporation and we just give away information on balanced meals because everyone deserves to know all the details of how to eat balanced meals to manage and control weight and health.

If the purpose of your proposed rule is to manage and control the obesity and diabetes epidemics, then the proposed rule needs to be written in such a way to enable that lofty goal to be met. The proposed addition of Maximum Beverage Size to Article 81 of the New York City Health Code, in Title 24 of the Rules of the City of New York must consider and reflect applicable rules of balanced meals consumption. The Acting Corporation Counsel Steven Goulden certified that the proposed rule is not in conflict with other applicable rules; however this is not true, there are guidelines for appropriate portion sizes for balanced meals and in order to accomplish managing and controlling the obesity and diabetes epidemics, these guidelines of balanced meals consumption need to be reflected in the addition of Article 81.53 in a way that can be very easily understood by the general public.

Portion size is the key factor in controlling weight and blood sugar and the effect of consumption of sugary drinks can be measured and documented with home blood glucose monitoring equipment or in the lab. If we want to manage and control the obesity and diabetes epidemics then we need to rally the people of our city to understand appropriate portion sizes. The 16 ounce size suggested in the proposed rule is not small enough to control weight and blood sugar levels for anyone in the general public. Sixteen ounces of soda pop without ice is double the amount of high glycemic carbohydrates that is appropriate for a balanced meal that will maintain blood sugar in a favorable therapeutic zone that is not too high and not too low.

The wording of the rule must be clearer. The way the proposed rule is written does not adequately define "sugary drink." I am proposing following definition of sugary drink:

"A sugary drink is a carbonated or non carbonated beverage that is nonalcoholic and is sweetened with sugar or any other caloric sweetener; regardless of whether the sweetening is affected by:

- nature (6 to 8 ounces of cranberry, grape or pineapple fruit juices or 8 to 10 ounces apple, grapefruit, lemonaide, lime juice, and orange fruit juices)

- a manufacturer (a ready to purchase 8 to 10 ounce bottle of soda pop)
- by the food service establishment itself during food preparation
- by the consumer self sweetening."

Examples of sugars or caloric sweeteners include:
1) natural fructose in fruit juices
2) natural sugar from cane that the food service establishment or the consumer adds
3) corn sugar that is high fructose corn syrup used in man made commercial products
4) there may be more sources of sugars and caloric sweeteners.

All of these sugary drinks must be considered part of the carbohydrate portion of a meal and they are equal to high glycemic foods in their ability to raise blood sugar and cause weight gain. The limit of high glycemic carbohydrate or sugary drink for a meal is 8 to 10 ounces of soda pop or about 6 to 10 ounces of fruit juice and that's it for this meal. Its one carbohydrate per meal and these sizes mentioned here are the limit for each meal of our three daily meals.

In order to overcome the obesity and diabetes epidemics we need to resolve that we understand that the following portion sizes are the limit for one meal based on a diet of three balanced meals and two balanced snacks daily.
Choose one carbohydrate food per meal:

- 8 to 10 ounces of soda pop
- 6 to 8 ounces of cranberry, grape or pineapple fruit juices
- 8 to 10 ounces apple, grapefruit, lemonaide, lime juice, orange fruit juices
- 6 to 8 ounces ice cream
- one banana
- one bun
- two slices of bread
- one potato the size of your fist
- any appropriate portions of carbohydrate food(s) or a sugary drink

Choose one per meal, only one high glycemic food or a sugary drink per meal. Plan your meals to have a different high glycemic carbohydrate food or a sugary drink at your next meal. Smaller portions of multiple carbohydrate foods at one meal are also acceptable, like eating a smorgasbord and consuming a taste of more than one carbohydrate food product. Sugary drinks and fruit juices are equal to the high glycemic foods like bread and rice and pasta; and to manage and control obesity and diabetes it's either the soda or the bun or the fries; but all three at one meal, we won't be able to do it, it's not possible to control obesity or diabetes that way. We need to have appropriate portions at appropriate intervals in the format of three balanced meals and two balanced snacks a day.

I don't think the definition of a sugary drink should include "sweetened by the establishment" because now-a-days there is ready made commercial size product provided by manufacturers ready to go for soda fountain service. Even when soda is sold in cups in a pizza shop or wherever the large dispensing vessel is, it is sweetened by the manufacturer and general not by the establishment. Now a-days there is usually not mixing and making like in the days of the soda fountains. I believe this is not necessary or appropriate, as it opens a whole new set of rules in torts. Sweetened by the establishment at a restaurant is subject to a different set of tort rules than sales of ready to go bottles or soda product because of quality control issues and other factors.

Regarding Milk Substitute as any liquid that is soy based used as a substitute for milk, be aware that there is soy milk that is plain that has an equal amount of protein, carbohydrates and fat and would not be considered a sugary drink. One 6 to 8 ounce glass of unflavored cow's milk is one appropriate portion of all three macronutrients for a balanced meal and so is unflavored soymilk. However there is also flavored soy milk which is in the category of carbohydrate food or sugary drink. Flavored soy milks are not balanced like plain 2% milk they have sweetener, they have more carbs than unflavored soy milk. Rice milk should also be considered a sugary drink because it is made of rice, a high glycemic carbohydrate. Almond, coconut or nut milk may be considered like milk or unflavored drinks; but they may contain sweeteners that would be considered a caloric sweetener and put them in the category of carbohydrate food or sugary drink.

The last sentence of the proposed rule says, "The rule does not limit the amount of sweetener a customer may add to his or her own drink" I disagree adding sweetener to a drink makes the drink into a sugary drink so the definition of sugary drinks should also include amounts for caloric sweeteners that consumers add themselves.

The goal would be to resolve to understand the actual amounts of sugary drinks that are appropriate for a balanced meal in order to get the consumers/customers to take responsibility for their choices, to get the consumers/customers to make informed choices each and every meal and snack.

It is mentioned in the paragraph Portion sizes are increasing that a 64 fluid ounces size cup/container contains 54 teaspoons of sugar which provides to the body 780 calories of energy in the form of glucose sugar. This is a family size product. There are 8 eight ounce servings in a 64 fluid ounce bottle or cup. Nobody thinks a 64 ounce half gallon container of milk is for one person. We all know it contains eight servings of milk. The thought process that 64 ounces of soda is really eight meal size portions needs to be front and center in the minds of the public. Labeling guidelines could be added for larger bottled family size products which spell out "there are 8 servings in this package."

Now there is another issue and that is the restaurants FSEs have an interesting phenomenon happening. There is evidence that 12 ounces of actual soda becomes a 32 ounce product when the cup is filled with ice. Therefore it is imperative that the amendment specifically state that the appropriate portion size for soda pop is 8 to 10 ounces regardless of using larger size cups for ice or for diluting. (http://www.silive.com/news/index.ssf/2012/06/staten_island_serving_of_42-ou.html)

Regarding value meals I told McDonald's in a lawsuit in 2003 with fat teens that the Big Mac has too much carbohydrates and that selling fries and soda as a value meal is like eating enough for three meals worth of carbohydrates at one huge meal. The Big Mac really does fit the definition of a defective product because it would cause someone's blood sugar level to be extremely high if measured with home blood glucose monitor, higher than a balanced meal with a salad would cause blood sugar to increase. Eating of excessive carbohydrates often is the problem. McDonald's incorporated the word "choices" in their advertising language but they still sell value meals with multiple high glycemic carbohydrate foods and sugary drinks in one meal.

A better strategy may be to establish and resolve that we understand that the limit for a sugary drink at a meal is 8 to 10 ounces of soda pop or 6 to 10 ounces of fruit juice. A size range is presented here because factors such as female or male, smaller person or larger person, sedentary person or physically active person determine accordingly the smaller or larger portion that would be appropriate.

We need to resolve that balanced meals consist of three to four portions of carbohydrates, three to four portions of protein foods and three to four portions of good fat. And we need to resolve that we understand that we require at least three full balanced meals and two balanced snacks daily on a schedule. Don't wait more than one hour from waking up to eat and eat every 4 to 6 hours while waking, because we need to keep our blood sugar stable, not too high and not too low at all times. Pregnant woman need to eat five meals a day with the smaller portion sizes. People who consume acid blocking medications need to eat smaller meals around the clock as well. Also we need to resolve that we require half our food intake to be low glycemic vegetables or vegetable juices and therefore all meals should include low carb vegetables or salads so a person doesn't get excess acid and need an acid blocker.

We need to consider eliminating sales of value meals and purchases of multiple portions of carbohydrates at one meal and require Food Service Establishments to serve everything ala carte and maybe require them to list the offerings according to Proteins, Carbohydrates and Fats. For example:

Proteins	Carbs	Fats
Burger	Bun	Mayo
Burger	Fries/Ketchup	Mayo
Burger	Ketchup/Pickles/Soda Pop	Nuts
Burger	Fruit Juice	Olives
Burger	Ice Cream	Coconut milk
Chicken	Rice	Seeds
Fish	Pasta	Cream sauce
Fish	Rice	Nori Sea vegetable

Regarding the amendments we are considering:

1. Limit soda pop without ice size to 8 to 10 ounces per meal and allow any size cup (for ice or diluting with seltzer) people want.

2. Limit fruit juice to 6 to 8 ounces, and include in sugary drink category even if it is natural sugar. Include chocolate milk as a sugary drink because it has much more carbohydrates than plain unflavored 2 % milk. Exclude unflavored soy or nut milks as sugary drinks but include flavored soy, nut and rice milk as sugary drinks.

3. Don't fine Food Service Establishments for anything, require them to sell ala carte and eliminate value meals from the landscape of our people, so that people can choose if they really want to limit their meals to one appropriate portion of carbohydrate food or sugary drink per meal.

We should consider eliminating taxing bottled water and unflavored seltzer. When water or carbonated water is the beverage you can eat other carbohydrate foods and still keep your blood sugar in a favorable zone that is not too high and not too low.

Again we should set a maximum size per meal for sugary drinks as follows:
8 to 10 ounces of soda pop
6 to 10 ounces of fruit juice

We should not set a limit on cup sizes used for ice or for diluting with water or seltzer.

We should not fine the FSEs. We should require all sales to be ala carte with menus helping people to realize and recognize all the carbohydrate choices.

On behalf of COPP A LIFE CORP I invite you to utilize the guidelines published at www.balancedmeals.org because they are definitively the means to managing and controlling the obesity and diabetes epidemics. Regarding the Mayor's Operations Officer Ruby Choi's Certification and Analysis, the language as proposed is not understandable enough for general public to understand and I highly recommend utilizing the language and portion sizes written herein. The proposed rule written as is can not provide a cure period, not because that would pose a risk to public health, but because the language of the proposed rule would not affect a cure as it is written. However if the rule is written as suggested here and we rally the people, this is how we do it. We will start to see people with better management and control of obesity and diabetes within 6 months to a year.

Please contact me for further assistance, information or explanation. As a non profit corporation we are working on securing funding from the non profit sector in order to support public education about balanced meals and we hope to facilitate this endeavor of Mayor Bloomberg and the New York City Board of Health.

Thank you for your consideration.

Sugar Sweetened Beverage

Andrew Daines [andrew@preplaysports.com]
Sent: Tuesday, July 24, 2012 9:55 AM
To: Resolution Comments

Dr. Richard Daines was no friend to the beverage industry. As the New York State Health Commissioner from 2007-2010, not only did he push for an excise tax on sugar-sweetened beverages, he quit drinking the stuff himself sometime after his "SODA vs. MILK" video on YouTube went viral. If you haven't seen the video, the exclamation point is a shot of my Dad flinging a fake blob of fat off camera in representation of the weight you'd lose by giving up just one can of soda per week. Just one 12-ounce can of sugary liquid each week.

In attempting to fight obesity through public health policy, Dr. Daines stirred up a hornet's nest of corporate interest. Were he still alive today, he would be continuing to demand responsive government action to the obesity epidemic, and no doubt having some fun pointing out all of the old tricks the beverage industry and others use to fight the mountain of scientific evidence that sugar-sweetened beverages are the leading cause of obesity in New York State.

I am writing as Dr. Daines' son – a New Yorker, born and raised - to pledge my support for Mayor Bloomberg's proposal to limit the sale of sugar sweetened beverages to 16 ounce containers or smaller in various key locations. This innovative policy will have the effect of reducing sugary beverage consumption by causing us to stop and think about the drinks we buy, how much we pay for them, and whether an alternative, perhaps healthier drink might be a good idea.

Opponents of the policy – namely, a beverage industry that makes millions of dollars from the sale of sugary drinks in New York – has already begun to dust off its playbook from 2010.

In 2010 the Beverage Industry spent $13 million dollars fighting a statewide excise tax of a penny per ounce on their product - a naked use of dollars to influence policy through advertising, fear tactics, and political donation. At the height of that campaign, the Beverage Industry's grip on elected officials was so tight, hardly any elected official from Westchester County - where Pepsi has massive operations - would appear in a photograph with my father for fear of losing the goodwill of their largest benefactor by standing next to the industry's foe.

This year, the Beverage Indsustry has spent an untold amount on a farcical "grassroots" effort called "New Yorkers for Beverage Choices" aimed at reframing this debate from public health to freedom of choice. At no point does the industry acknowledge that the choice to drink any amount of soda at any time still remains for New Yorkers under the Mayor's plan. If they were being honest, they would have named it "International Conglomerates for Maintenance of the Unhealthy - But Profitable - Status Quo".

Assuming this organization is to be taken seriously, they're argument boils down to a few bullet points. For one, they say the Mayor's policy is silly and that it won't change behavior. Well then why are they spending millions of dollars lobbying and speaking out against it? For another, they're saying the Beverage Industry are not the only bad guys, and that lawmakers should go after the makers of fatty foods in order to be fair. Well this line is a flat out admission that sugary drinks cause obesity, mixed with a ridiculous appeal that in order to do something about it we must do everything about it all at once. Everyone knows this is not how good policy is formulated and passed into law. We must start somewhere, and where better to start than the epicenter of the obesity epidemic: the overconsumption of sugary drinks?

Mayor Bloomberg, like my father, has started a statewide conversation about obesity and the best ways to curb it through public health policy. Most sodas are the nutritional equivalent of condensed and liquefied cotton candy. They're underpriced and over-consumed, especially by children. Responsive government can and should do something about it, and that's why I stand by my father's legacy and the policy of our mayor. I pray New Yorkers will come around to the idea that this measure is in our interest. It will create more decision points for consumers to actively choose what goes in their bodies and thereby reduce consumption a little. Remember what it takes to fling that blob fat away: just one less 12-ounce can of sugary liquid each week.

Sincerely,

Andrew Daines

Re: Department of Health and Mental Hygiene Proposed Rule Related to Maximum Size of Sugary Drinks and Self-Service Beverage Cups Sold and Offered in Food Service Establishments

Dear Members of the Board of Health:

Dunkin' Brands, Inc. submits these comments in response to the Proposed Amendment of Article 81 (Food Preparation and Food Establishments) of the New York City Health Code, found in Title 24 of the Rules of the City of New York. Dunkin' Brands strongly opposes the proposed rule and submits these comments of opposition and concern for your review.

Dunkin' Brands, Inc. is the parent company of two of the world's most recognized brands, Dunkin' Donuts and Baskin-Robbins. Dunkin' Donuts and Baskin-Robbins restaurants are essentially 100% franchised, meaning our restaurants are owned and operated by independent business owners. The average Dunkin' Donuts franchisee owns 5.9 restaurants and the average Baskin-Robbins franchisee owns 1.3 restaurants. These franchisees own and operate approximately 478 Dunkin' Donuts restaurants with 196 of those being Dunkin' Donuts/Baskin-Robbins combos, and 5 stand-alone Baskin-Robbins restaurants in New York City.

We believe that the proposed rule by Mayor Bloomberg and the New York Department of Health and Mental Hygiene seeking to eliminate New Yorkers' rights to purchase beverages in sizes of their choice is not in the public's interest. At Dunkin' Donuts and Baskin-Robbins restaurants, we believe restaurants have responsibility to offer customers a variety of menu options and easy-to-read nutritional information, offer a wide range of product choices in various sizes and flavors that fit all customers lifestyles and dietary preferences. But then it should be up to individuals to make the choices that are right for them. In our view providing the appropriate consumer facts and choice is a more appropriate way to fight obesity.

To that end, Dunkin' Donuts and Baskin-Robbins restaurants offer a wide variety of food and beverages choices – from our coffee and classic bakery items, to our DDSMART menu, which has better-for-you items like a Latte Lite with 80 calories or an Egg White Veggie Turkey

Sausage Flatbread for under 300 calories. While we launched our DDSMART better-for-you menu four years ago, we have been providing customers with better for you alternatives for years, i.e. Latte Lite, reduced fat flavored cream cheeses, etc. Additionally, we proactively reduced the sugar content in our Coolatta beverages by 15% three years ago. We have eliminated all trans fat from our menu. We also created a Nutritional Advisory Board, comprised of leading experts, to help us stay ahead of health and wellness trends while enhancing the nutritional value of menu choices. Attached is the leaflet that shows our DDSMART menu.

Our belief of options and choices for our customers is the reason Dunkin' Brands has been a leader in the effort to establish national menu labeling standards across the country. Dunkin' Brands led and supported the historic agreement included in the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act of 2010 to create a uniform national nutrition standard in chain restaurants and similar establishments. It is our commitment to menu choices and options that leads us to share our views about the proposed regulation

Exclusion of Convenience Stores and Grocery Stores

The proposed regulation seeks to limit the maximum size of beverages sold in food service establishments. The regulation states:

> "FSEs are an important source of food and beverages for New York City residents. An estimated one third of daily caloric intake comes from foods purchased and prepared outside of the home, and this proportion is increasing. By eating out more people are more likely to be exposed to oversized beverages sold at restaurants."

Without arguing the validity of the statistics, this language in the proposed regulation seeks to advance the Mayor's reasoning for such a proposal. Yet, the language of the regulation itself undermines the reasoning and motivation mentioned above by not including convenience stores in the regulation.

Convenience stores market themselves as quick service restaurants and are direct competitors for food and beverages sold in restaurants such as Dunkin' Donuts. This argument is made by the convenience store industry itself. For example, the website of the New York Association of Convenience Stores states that convenience stores have become quick-serve restaurants, banks, and gas stations for busy consumers[1]. The Association's website further states statistics for the amount of various beverages sold at convenience stores last year including over 4 billion cups of coffee[2]. The industry asserts it is a community gathering place for neighborhoods where the public can purchase food and beverages[3].

[3] Id.

Beyond the convenience store industry's own words, objective research organizations also classify convenience stores in the quick service category of restaurants. The NDP Group CREST® data defines convenience stores in the retail category of quick service restaurants. The guidelines for the inclusion of convenience stores in the QSR category applies to establishments that provide food and beverages to be ordered at a counter, drive-thru or delivery and are consumed within 6 hours of purchase.

In addition to the industry's own characterization as quick-service restaurants and objective criteria, a look at the beverages sold in convenience stores also argues the need for equity and inclusion under the regulation. Convenience stores, grocery stores, bodegas, and other businesses located just feet from the restaurants where the ban would be implemented will still be allowed to sell sugary beverages in whatever size containers they want. A Gulp at a 7-Eleven is 20 ounces, a Big Gulp is 30 ounces, Super Big Gulps are 40 ounces, and Double Gulps are 50 ounces. A Double Gulp can contain as many as 600 calories. These beverage sizes far exceed the size of the beverages offered in a Dunkin' Donuts restaurant, yet their size is not limited under the proposed regulation. According to a recent New York Times article, managers in some of the 7-Eleven franchises in New York City estimated that almost 10 percent of their store income comes from the sale of Big Gulps[4].

The inequities in the proposed regulation between restaurants and convenience stores will also lead to consumer confusion and absurd scenarios that will also undermine the regulation's supposed intent. Imagine going to Dunkin' Donuts and being denied a medium Iced Coffee, with skim milk and sugar, only to be able to walk across the street to a convenience store to purchase a Super Big Gulp 40 ounce drink that contains considerably more sugar. This isn't right for our consumers or for our franchisees, independent businessmen and women who will be at a competitive disadvantage under the proposed regulatory scheme. Again, using the information on the industry's website, convenience stores sold billions of cups of coffee last year. Yet their cups of coffee are not affected by the ban while cups of coffee at a Dunkin' Donuts are affected.

Ban Harms Small Businesses

In addition to the confusing scenarios of which beverages can be bought in restaurants versus convenience stores, the proposed ban seeks to pick winners and losers in the small business community. Dunkin' Donuts and Baskin-Robbins franchisees will be affected by this proposal, both financially and operationally. As we noted above, there are approximately 483 Dunkin' Donuts and Baskin-Robbins restaurants in New York City 100% of which are owned and operated by independent small businessmen and businesswomen. Yet, the small business owner who owns and operates a convenience stores stands to profit from the disadvantage of his/her competitors in the restaurant industry created by this ban. Under this ban, sales would go down which would impact the amount of labor that the small business could afford to deploy.

[4] Edwards, Aaron, "At 7-Eleven, the Big Gulps Elude a Ban by the City", New York Times, 7 June 2012, A20.

Dunkin' Donuts and Baskin-Robins franchisees live and work in the communities in New York City. Every day, these franchisees seek to serve the guests in their communities, yet they are being unfairly penalized for the work they do. Bans such as the one proposed by Mayor Bloomberg think they are targeting large industries such as restaurants without regard for the livelihood of small business owners in New York who are the heart and soul of our company and industry. Pitting one small business owner against another does not effectuate change. It creates an uneven playing field and a competitive disadvantage that demonstrates a bias against restaurants.

Ban Affects More than just Soda

The proposed ban seeks to impose an expansive definition of the term "sugary drink". We take issue with this definition and its supposed application in the restaurant environment. According to the regulation as currently drafted, the ban will affect several beverages served Dunkin' Donuts and Baskin-Robbins in sizes over 16 ounces, including sweetened hot and iced coffee beverages, sweetened hot and iced tea, hot chocolate, Dunkaccino®, coffees with flavored toppings and some frozen beverages such as Coolatta® frozen drinks and Frozen Coffee and Fruit Blasts.

New Yorkers may not be able to get their favorite cup of coffee or frozen beverage the way they like it because the regulation fails to acknowledge that customers "customize" drinks to suit their tastes. At Dunkin' Donuts, we make guests' coffee just the way they request it, by adding dairy and sweetener for them to help keep them running and on their way quickly. As part of the proposed ban, Dunkin' Donuts crew members would not be allowed to add sweetener to beverages larger than 16 ounces. Guests would be required to add sweetener themselves. While the regulation states the rule will not the limit the amount of sweetener a customer may add to his/her drink, the regulation does not recognize that a customer adds his or her own sweetener when they ask a crewmember at a restaurant to add cream or sugar to their drink. Hot coffee, ice coffee, iced tea and other drinks are served black and/or unsweetened. It is the customer that requests sweetener be added to their drink, yet the regulation does acknowledge this customization process is the same as the customer adding sweetener themselves. There is no difference between in customer's request behind the counter versus in front of the counter.

Additionally, we believe it is unfair to include sweetened coffee and tea larger than 16 ounces in the same category as other sugar-sweetened beverages. A comparison of the amount of sugar, calories and fat in a large iced coffee made with milk and sugar, versus other beverages in the proposed ban, supports our position.

Given the breath of the proposed regulation, six months is not sufficient to comply with a regulation of this type. If the regulation imposes operational changes on our franchisees and their restaurants, these franchisees will need at least one year to implement such changes with the number of affected restaurants in the City. We urge the Board of Health consider a longer implementation period than six months.

Conclusion

We believe this proposed ban will result in consumer confusion, a reduced sales tax base for the city and increased difficulties for hard-working small businesspeople while simultaneously putting a lid on New Yorkers' personal freedom of choice. We thank you for the opportunity to provide comments. We appreciate your consideration of our concerns.

Respectfully yours,

Comment: Where does the goverment have the right to control what we decide to eat or drink. We are not automatons that all think alike. We deserve the right to choose what we decide to purchase for consumption without having the Mayor DICTATE his priorities. If he wants to dictate let hiim go to a country that does not have free thinking individuals. He is acting more like a dictator than a Mayor. With all the problems the city faces why not concentrate on creating jobs and making the city more livable.

Comment:	At the Y, we know that there is no magic bullet in the fight against obesity.

The Y applauds the Mayor's effort to take aim at the obesity epidemic including the proposed containment of plus-sized sugary drinks. It's important for New Yorkers and for all Americans to understand the grave consequences to our society - physical, mental and financial - if our everyday behaviors don't change, and the implications for our children are even more severe.

The Mayor continues to move the City's looming health crisis to the forefront in the consciousness of New Yorkers. This is being accomplished through a combination of public information campaigns and bold legislation. Whatever one's position on the plus-sized soda ban, it has already achieved an important, early objective: it has reached a national audience. Let's hope New Yorkers and Americans are able to look beyond the superficial arguments associated with this legislation to its real motivation.

Comment:	I support restrictions on container sizes but also beleive the city should encourage a delicious and free alternative -- water. Water fountains should be available in many more places, increasing the number in public parks and requiring them in bonus plazas that are part of new skyscrapers in busy commercial areas. Comment:	The health consequences of the status quo are apparent all around us; something needs to be done. Those opposed to the Mayors proposal must shoulder the burden of a genuinely viable alternative. Failing that, a pilot test of the big soda ban would be the logical next step, to determine if its effects are as intended, or otherwise. Dear New York City Board of Health:

The Association of State and Territorial Health Officials (ASTHO), a nonpartisan organization representing the leaders of state and territorial public health agencies, thanks you for this opportunity to comment on Mayor Bloomberg's initiative to limit sugar-sweetened beverage consumption.

As an organization, we are deeply concerned about the toll that obesity and related chronic diseases are having on Americans. Two-thirds of the U.S. population is obese or overweight with one-third of U.S. children overweight or at risk of being overweight. Chronic diseases are the cause of 70 percent of our nation's deaths and are inflicting staggering costs on our economy and our quality of life. A comprehensive approach is needed to address the obesity epidemic, and reducing sugary beverage intake is one important component.

Sugary beverages are consumed by about half of the U.S. population daily, with the greatest consumption by youth and young adults. More than one-third of sugary beverages consumed outside the home are purchased at fast-food and other restaurants.* The Dietary Guidelines for Americans do not recommend consumption of full or regular soda, but if it is consumed, it is best to limit consumption to small amounts.

As champions of healthy eating and active living policies and programs, ASTHO and its members are interested in development and dissemination of best and promising practices in chronic disease prevention. Encouraging consumption of healthier foods and increasing physical activity will take the efforts of many sectors and partners, both health and non-health organizations, and the leadership of states and localities to try innovative, promising approaches. We recognize NYC's various initiatives to reduce the obesity epidemic and attempts to explore and evaluate effective ways to reduce consumption of sugary beverages.

New York City has been a leader in promoting healthy eating policies and programs that are then offered as models nationwide. Currently, ASTHO is working with six states to change their statewide healthy procurement and sodium reduction policies. NYC serves as a good example in this project because of your previous efforts to reduce the sodium content of manufactured and restaurant foods. We applaud your efforts to decrease obesity rates in your city and create an environment where the healthier choice is the easy or default choice.

ASTHO and our members hope to learn from NYC's efforts and your other obesity reduction initiatives. We will disseminate these results to other state and local health agencies interested in reducing soda consumption.

We appreciate this opportunity to comment.
Thank you.

The New York State Restaurant Association ("NYSRA") is a trade group that represents approximately 5000 food service establishments ("FSE") in New York City and thousands more throughout the State of New York. NYSRA FSE members include both small "mom-and-pop" establishments and large chains alike throughout the five boroughs of New York City. NYSRA FSEs represent one of the largest constituencies regulated by the New York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene ("DOH").

The DOH's stated mission is "to protect and promote the health of all New Yorkers."[1] While DOH has undoubtedly taken great steps to further that mission, there are times when the public, and the regulated community of FSEs, has the right to question whether the furtherance of the DOH mission is being accomplished in an appropriate fashion. Unfortunately, NYSRA believes that the proposed maximum beverage size or portion control regulation (§ 81.53)(the "Portion Control Regulation") is a regulation inconsistent with the DOH's mission and one that will not achieve the purported goals desired by the DOH. Accordingly, NYSRA objects to the proposed regulation and asks that the Board of Health reject the proposed regulation.

The Portion Control Regulation seeks to accomplish by fiat what should be accomplished by education. Here, the Portion Control Regulation will prohibit citizens from making a choice by removing size selections instead of educating consumers about the effects of their choices.

The Portion Control Regulation is inconsistent with the DOH's prior efforts to address health issues through education and choice. For example, mandatory calorie posting allows consumers to make a choice based on detailed information. Similarly, the smoking ban removed a choice of where one could smoke, which addressed the fact that second-hand smoke may harm others. But, the smoking ban still allowed consumers to make an informed choice about whether to smoke.

Though a concern based on Orwellian fears, NYSRA questions whether having the government make choices for consumers is the appropriate method for accomplishing DOH's mission. Many have used the term "What's Next?" to address their concerns with the passage of the Portion Control Regulation. And they are correct for doing so. Each and every board member should carefully consider that the DOH – if allowed to regulate portion sizes for soda – can next decide to make further choices for consumers by denying access to certain foods. Nearly any food, when eaten in excess, can contribute to obesity. To selectively choose soda today means that French Fries, hamburgers, or pizza can be limited, or banned, in the future. And this very future scenario has apparently been envisioned by the DOH as shown in its recent publications in support of the Portion Control Regulation.[2] While that may not be the intent of the Board today, the path of good intentions can lead to unforeseen results.

NYSRA further asks DOH to strongly consider that the Portion Control Regulation will largely impact only one segment of FSEs which, in turn, predominate in certain neighborhoods of New York City. This inequitable application results in a two-fold problem. First, it only impacts certain businesses, thereby placing the impacted businesses at a competitive disadvantage from a store that can be one door away. DOH cannot rationally explain how prohibiting a consumer from buying a twenty ounce soda at a movie theatre or a restaurant, while allowing the same purchase at a convenience store next door, will equitably further DOH's mission. Secondly, the regulation would most likely impact those on the socio-economic ladder who choose larger portion sizes for economic reasons. DOH regulations should not create uncompetitive disadvantages for FSEs. Nor should DOH enact a regulation that will have the de facto effect of impacting only certain sectors of the consumer public.

Finally, the selective application of the regulation on only certain kinds of sugary beverages[3] will only lead challenges to the Portion Control regulation. The proposed regulation appears to arbitrarily define what will be regulated without providing adequate justification for the exemptions set forth in the regulation. As noted above, over consumption of nearly any food or beverage will result in obesity concerns. Yet the selective approach to stem obesity contained in the Portion Control Regulation would only seem to presage a later extension to all foods and beverages because it cannot succeed regulating one type of beverage. If the ultimate goal is to regulate portion control on all foods and beverages, the DOH should be upfront about that goal instead of engaging in a piece-meal approach through this proposed regulation.

DOH has shown a history of developing creative programs to address public health concerns. From Shop Healthy NYC, which is a voluntary program to promote healthier food choices, to Take Care New York, which provides information on healthier lifestyles, DOH has continued to seek to improve the lives of New Yorkers. It has continued to do this by educating New Yorkers so they can make informed choices. For example, DOH, in a recent press release, stated:

> New York City has a comprehensive approach to changing the food environment and is committed to increasing awareness among New Yorkers about good nutrition and healthy food options by improving the availability of healthy food and educating New Yorkers about the importance of a healthy diet.[4]

NYSRA applauds and agrees with DOH's and Mayor Bloomberg's efforts to educate New Yorkers so they can make appropriate food choices and further the goal of healthier lifestyles. But, the Portion Control Regulation is one that denies access to a product – which is perfectly safe – based on the DOH's concerns about some consumers' lifestyle choices. While the goal of reducing obesity is laudable – and one that NYSRA will gladly work with DOH to accomplish – the Portion Control Regulation is not the way to accomplish that goal.

For these reasons, NYSRA requests that you reject proposed § 81.53. NYSRA thanks you for the opportunity to comment on this important matter.

Respectfully Submitted,

Community Healthcare Network

Testimony of Catherine Abate
President and CEO
Community Healthcare Network

Hearing before the New York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene Public Discussion on Regulating the Maximize Size of Sugary Drinks
NYCDOHMH
July 24, 2012

My name is Catherine M. Abate. I am President and CEO of Community Healthcare Network (CHN). We have been in existence since 1981 and currently run 13 federally qualified health centers. We are a NCQA-designated Level 3 Patient-Centered Medical Home as well as a lead Health Home in Brooklyn and Queens and a co-lead in Manhattan and the Bronx. We provide comprehensive services including primary care, behavioral health and social services to over 75,000 individuals per year.

I commend the mayor on his introduction of proposed changes to Article 81 of the Health Code which would establish maximum sizes for beverages offered and sold in food service establishments. This limit would apply to all cups and containers used for sugary drinks.

It is well documented that sugary-drinks contribute more calories and added sugars to our diets than any other food or beverage. Studies have shown that an excess of added sugars can lead to obesity and a host of related health problems, including Type II diabetes, high blood pressure and high cholesterol. Childhood obesity is epidemic in New York and leads to serious health consequences, including cardiovascular disease and increased mortality.

Sugary drinks are a leading driver of the obesity epidemic and are associated with dangerous chronic diseases. Americans consume 200-300 more calories daily than 30 years ago, with the largest single increase due to sugary drinks. A 20 ounce sugary drink can contain the equivalent of 16 packets of sugar. Sugary drink consumption among New York City residents is alarming. More than 30% of adult New Yorkers report drinking one or more sugary drink per day.

The negative health effects of consuming sugary drinks are well documented yet beverage companies continue to market these products aggressively to children and teens. Exposure to TV advertising for sugary drinks is associated with higher consumption of these products. Companies spend more on marketing sugary beverages to children and adolescents compared with any other food category. Further, marketing for sugary drinks also may be targeted disproportionately more often to minority and low-income youth who consume more of these products and are at higher risk of obesity and related diseases.

A coalition of more than 100 health organizations and health professions has called upon the Surgeon General for a report on sugary drinks. These organizations include the American Medical Association, American Diabetes Association, American Health Association, American Dental Association and American Academy of Pediatrics. A recent report from the Institute of Medicine recommends implementing public health policies that limit consumption of sugary drinks along with a tax on sugar-sweetened beverages.

In conclusion, a policy reducing the portion size of sugary beverages is good public health and makes sense.

Mayor Bloomberg's beverage size proposal

Comment:	Dear Board of Health members,

The Yale Rudd Center conducts research on a wide range of food policy and obesity issues, with a goal of providing strong evidence to support policies which will have the greatest impact on Americans' health. We work extensively on policies to reduce the consumption of sugar-sweetened beverages.
We believe that adopting Mayor Bloomberg's proposal to limit the size of sugary drinks sold in NYC food service establishments will benefit the health and well-being of the citizens of New York. And the city will once again become a public health role model for cities and states across the county which are searching for effective ways to help people curb their consumption of sugary drinks.
The drinks included in the proposal represent the single greatest source of added sugar in the American diet and contribute to the significant obesity, diabetes, and cardiovascular disease crisis in the US today. These beverages provide empty calories with no nutrition, are marketed aggressively by industry, and, most notably, act on the body differently than calories contained in solid foods. People do not feel as if they have consumed as many calories when they are delivered in beverages.
Profit margins on these beverages are enormous--90 percent, as compared to, for example, 10 percent for produce. And profits increase as people buy bigger portions because the additional cost for the soda companies and restaurants to serve larger sizes may be mere cents for a larger cup and the extra liquid. The companies gain, but consumers lose because both adults and children eat and drink more when they are served more. Any incentive to help people drink smaller portions of sugary beverages makes good public health sense.
Legal Basis
Regulations that affect ordinary commercial transactions are presumed to be constitutional if they rest on a rational basis and enacted within the knowledge and experience of the governing body. (2) The Department is an expert public health body that undertook a great deal of research to determine the impact excessive consumption of sugary beverages was having on its citizens. It enacted the regulation to curb the sale of these products accordingly. The regulation is rationally related to a legitimate government interest.
States and their political subdivisions, including New York City, have the power to enact laws to protect the public health, safety and welfare, and may use this power to regulate the sale of products with public health implications.(3) The Department has jurisdiction over food service establishments, public health, and food safety.
The ordinance is a standard public health measure despite its novel focus. There is nothing legally questionable about the proposed ordinance.
First, there are no federal or state laws preempting the city's ability to pass the serving size ordinance.
Second, the serving size ordinance does not even tenuously implicate the First Amendment because the city is not regulating any component of speech.
Third, the ordinance does not violate the Commerce Clause. The Commerce Clause provides Congress with the power to regulate commerce among the states and it also denies states the power to unjustifiably discriminate against or burden interstate commerce. (5) In order for industry to succeed on such a claim, a court would need to determine that the portion size restriction results in "differential treatment of in-state and out-of-state economic interests that benefits the former and burdens the latter." (5) This is not the case because all food service establishments within the city will be required to comply with the law; thus, out of city economic interests are burdened no more than those within the city. Further, the Commerce Clause only protects the "interstate market" and not particular in-state business from regulations that affect or burden the current structure of the retail market. (6)
Finally, the ordinance does not violate the Equal Protection Clause even though it distinguishes between sugary beverages and other products (such as milk) and between food retailers and other retailers (such as grocery stores). Laws, like the NYC ordinance, that do not burden fundamental rights or target certain classes of people need only be rationally related to a legitimate government interest. Under this test, the governing body "may take piecemeal steps which only partially ameliorate a perceived evil and create some disparate treatment of affected parties." (7) The city does not violate the constitution even if the classification made by its law is "imperfect." (7) Here the classifications are rationally based. Sugary beverages, unlike other beverages, have known health harms. Further, the Department's distinction among food retailers is based on the Department's jurisdiction; it can only regulate entities within its jurisdiction. Thus, the ordinance's !
distinctions are rational and constitutional.

Thank you for your consideration of this important matter.

THE CITY OF NEW YORK
OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT

SCOTT M. STRINGER

TESTIMONY OF MANHATTAN BOROUGH PRESIDENT SCOTT M. STRINGER

BEFORE THE NEW YORK CITY DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH AND MENTAL HYGIENE'S BOARD OF HEALTH

Regarding proposed Amendment of Article 81 (Food Preparation and Food Establishments) of the New York City Health Code, found in Title 24 of the Rules of the City of New York

Tuesday, July 24, 2012

Good morning, and thank you Chairman Farley for this opportunity to speak in support of the proposed amendment to Article 81 of our city's Health Code, which would limit the size of sugary drinks and self-service beverage cups in many city establishments.

As everyone here knows, since Mayor Bloomberg first outlined this proposal last May, the so-called "soda-ban" has sparked a worldwide debate. It has been the top of national newscasts, the butt of late night comics, and a source of endless debate in homes and offices around the globe.

The Mayor's proposal is understandably controversial; whenever government acts to limit aspects of personal choice citizens should voice their concerns, demand answers to their questions, and engage in constructive dialogue. This is the hallmark of a functioning democracy.

I take personal choice very seriously. I also believe government has an obligation to protect public health and use its power to regulate in times of crisis. The facts show that we are indeed in the midst of a public health crisis.

Here's what we know:

- Obesity is the leading cause of preventable death in the country. And it has now reached epidemic proportions in New York City, particularly in our poorest communities.
- More than half of New York City adults are now overweight or obese – a full 58% – as are some 30% of New York City public school children.
- Obesity is a risk factor for heart disease and cancer.

PHONE (212) 669-8300 FAX (212) 669-4305
www.mbpo.org bp@manhattanbp.org

- Adults who are obese are almost twice as likely to develop diabetes as those who are overweight, and almost three times as likely as those who are at a healthy weight.

Here's what else we know: Sugary drinks are now the largest source of sugar in the average American's diet, comprising nearly 43% of sugar intake. In New York, more than 30% of adults report drinking one or more sugary drinks a day, with rates much higher in minority and low-income neighborhoods.

In short, obesity has become a public health menace, and it is time we took on the soda cartel that drives this epidemic. And yes, it is a battle that we must fight on many fronts.

We must guarantee that people in all neighborhoods have access to fresh and healthy foods, close to home. That means supporting local farmers by making it easier for them to sell their produce at Hunts Point market, cutting red tape for community-based farmers markets, and it means helping small businesses by base-lining funding for the Healthy Bodegas Initiative.

It means making nutrition education part of our public school curriculum, and fighting to restore gym classes to every school in the city.

It means making sure that every child in New York City has a chance to start the day right with a healthy breakfast by expanding the "Breakfast in the Classroom" program.

Today we are taking one small step, but it is just that – a step.

And let's be clear – nothing is being banned here today. If New Yorkers want to consume more than 16 ounces of sugar sweetened beverages, there are many avenues for them to purchase these drinks.

This is not about taking away people's rights. It is about placing a sensible limit on the portion size of a substance that has been shown to have no nutritional value and to pose a serious threat to health. And this limit is necessary when the soda industry continues to super-size everything in the name of profits and denies the connection between sugar sweetened beverages and obesity.

The industry argues that serving sizes are smaller than ever. That is true – a serving is just 8 ounces. But according to the CDC, average portion size is just shy of 20 ounces. Anyone who's visited a fast food restaurant knows this – fountain drink sizes have grown by more than 400% in recent decades.

We must act today – for the sake our city and our children. New and bold strategies are needed and that is what we have been presented with today. I want to thank Mayor Bloomberg for the courage to take on this issue and for his proposal to limit serving sizes of sugar sweetened beverages.

I dont even know anyone who is. I also drink, probably, less than 16 oz of sugared soda...a year. But I am very tired of the tendency of this govt to confuse its role with that of a parent. To educate or advise is one thing [think food pyramid]; to mandate is quite another--even if the advice is sound. Are you really so sure that diet sodas [with all their chemicals] are that much healthier--esp. for those of us who are not obese? [I am not. Should I really be encouraged to drink the diet stuff? How many chemical laden drinks do you folks drink a day?] I wonder what is next on the hit list. hot dogs? doughnut shops? Even if the science were sound, I definitely think that the B of H should express its view, not legislate it.

KEEP FOOD LEGAL

To: New York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene

From: Baylen J. Linnekin, Executive Director, Keep Food Legal

Re: Comments Opposing the Proposed Amendment of Article 81 (Food Preparation and Food Establishments) of the New York City Health Code, found in Title 24 of the Rules of the City of New York

Date: July 24, 2012

Thank you for accepting these comments of Keep Food Legal, a grassroots nonprofit incorporated in Washington, DC, on behalf of our members and supporters. Keep Food Legal is the first and only nationwide, nonprofit membership organization devoted to food freedom—the right of every American to grow, raise, produce, buy, sell, share, cook, eat, and drink the foods and beverages of their own choosing. Keep Food Legal members and supporters hail from New York City and from cities and towns across the United States. Our members and supporters are key cogs in nearly every link in the food chain: farmers, ranchers, fishermen, hunters, manufacturers, grocers, restaurateurs, mobile food vendors, tavern owners, chefs, consumers, foodies, activists, academics, and authors.

Because Keep Food Legal fights for choice—rather than choices—we do not advocate in favor of any particular foods or food choices. Keep Food Legal has championed a variety of food freedom issues around the country recently—including the right to sell unpasteurized dairy products or foie gras, the right to operate a food truck or cart free from overly burdensome regulations, the right to grow one's own food in a home garden, the right to share food with the homeless and less fortunate, and the need to abolish government farm subsidies.

I am the founder and executive director of Keep Food Legal. I am a lawyer, earned an advanced degree (LL.M.) in agricultural and food law, and have written and spoken extensively on food law generally and, more specifically, on laws and regulations (like those proposed here in New York City) that would ban or severely restrict particular foods. My writings on this topic have appeared in the Chapman University Law Review, Northeastern University Law Journal, Reason magazine, Huffington Post, Washington Times, and elsewhere. I am also author of the entry on "food bans" in the forthcoming second edition of the Oxford Encyclopedia of Food and Drink in America. I have presented my research in this area at University of Chicago School of Law, Harvard University School of Law, Tulane University School of Law, Chapman University School of Law, Northeastern University School of Law, Suffolk University School of Law, New York University, and elsewhere.

Keep Food Legal, on behalf of its members and supporters, opposes the Proposed Amendment of Article 81 (Food Preparation and Food Establishments) of the New York City Health Code, found in Title 24 of the Rules of the City of New York (the "proposed ban") for four key reasons. I will describe each now in turn.

First, the proposed ban lacks any legitimate scientific justification and is so arbitrary in nature as to lack any requisite rational basis. The basis and purpose of the proposed ban rests on an argument by the New York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene (DOHMH) that Americans "consume 200-300 more calories daily than 30 years ago, with the largest single increase due to sugary drinks." In support of this claim—which DOHMH also touts at its website and which DOHMH Commissioner Dr. Thomas Farley has repeated in print and television interviews—the only evidence DOHMH cites as support for this basis of its proposed ban is a 2005 Annual Review of Public Health journal article. Yet the cited article, Economic Causes and Consequences of Obesity (Finkelstein et al. 2005), merely cites in pertinent part an earlier study that concluded "caloric intake rose by roughly 12% (300 calories per day) between 1985 and 2000, mainly because of increased consumption of grains, added fats, and added sugars." Drinks with added sugar like soda may or may not be part of that equation, but then so might virtually any food.[1] Finkelstein also gives equal weight to the varied conclusions of four other studies—which attribute increased caloric intake to other factors. "The published evidence, although not conclusive," concludes Finkelstein, "suggests that technology may be primarily responsible for the obesity epidemic." Consequently, the study that DOHMH has used as the very foundation of its proposed ban offers little or no support for banning soda of any size, and might better be used to support a ban on iPhones, televisions, or public transportation.

Second, implementation of the proposed ban would have both negative intended and unintended consequences. While some of these negative consequences are predictable, many are unknown at this time. The most obvious negative intended consequence is that the proposed ban would raise the taxes of New Yorkers—and do so in a most undemocratic manner. After all, at its heart the proposed ban is a revenue "bill" to be voted on by an unelected board that is intended to compel some New Yorkers to pay higher sales taxes. This would occur because a purchase of two sixteen-ounce beverages would a cost consumer more than a purchase of one beverage greater than sixteen ounces—and because sales taxes constitute a percentage of each sale and so rise in relation to the overall price of a sale. Mayor Bloomberg, both predicting and promoting the sale of multiple purchases the proposed ban would foster, said last month that when it comes to customers seeking one beverage greater than sixteen ounces, restaurants could instead "serve it in two" purchased cups.

There would likely be several unintended consequences of the proposed ban. At the micro-level, the proposed ban may force consumers who might have purchased one twenty-ounce beverage, for example, to purchase two beverages, or to consume a free refill they otherwise might have avoided. The proposed ban would also increase supply costs and decrease profits for New York City-based small businesses.

[1] One food group not part of this trend is fruits and vegetables. DOHMH itself highlighted a link between obesity and insufficient consumption of fruits and vegetables—along with lower levels of exercise—in its HEALTH BULLETIN #76, Good Fats/Bad Fats. "New York City neighborhoods that report lower physical activity levels and less fruit and vegetable consumption have higher obesity rates."

At the macro-level, the proposed ban would serve to further undermine legitimate prevention efforts in the area of public health. Earlier this year DOHMH received a flurry of negative publicity after the New York Times exposed a misleading public-service advertisement that was part of a DOHMH anti-soda campaign. As the Times reported, DOHMH digitally removed the leg of a man from an image and also inserted a crutch into the image so that the man would appear to be an amputee suffering from diabetes. If public-health officials mislead the very public they are duty bound to serve, the public will tune out not just the misleading messages but all messages related to public health. If that proves to be the case, then subterfuge carried out by public health agencies will have made the public less safe. Finally, the environmental consequences of the proposed ban should not be overlooked. More beverage containers inevitably means more paper, more plastic, and more waste.

Third, the proposed ban would restrict food freedom of choice. Mayor Michael Bloomberg opined last month that the right to drink a large soda is not one of the "freedoms.... that the Founding Fathers fought for." But the proposed ban is (as previously noted) a revenue bill to be voted on by an unelected board. In this way (and others), the proposed ban very much harkens back to those acts of British economic aggression against the American colonies in the 1760s and 1770s—which, like the Sugar Act, nearly always centered on unfairly taxing and restricting food choices—that led the Founding Fathers to fight the American Revolution.

On the other hand, Mayor Bloomberg is correct insofar as the Supreme Court has not yet recognized a fundamental right to eat certain foods. However, several Court justices have recognized a right to make one's own food choices. Justice William O. Douglas, the leading liberal of his time, wrote that the Ninth Amendment guarantee of unenumerated fundamental rights includes "one's taste for food... [which] is certainly fundamental in our constitutional scheme—a scheme designed to keep government off the backs of people." Other Justices have come out against food bans. Justice Stephen Field wrote that a right to make and procure food is an integral fundamental right of all Americans. Field called this right an essential element of liberty. More recently, Justice Antonin Scalia referred in dictum to a protected "right to eat."

These decisions of the various Justices find support from two of our most important Founding Fathers. Thomas Jefferson and James Madison, respective authors of the Declaration of Independence and Bill of Rights, abhorred laws that would ban foods—even if not a blanket ban—and were outspoken that such laws had no place in American law. Jefferson, in his influential Notes on the State of Virginia, attacked a contemporary French ban on eating the potato. Jefferson noted that such a ban allowed "[f]allible men" with their own prejudices and preferences to employ "coercion" to dictate the "diet" of the French people. Madison, meanwhile, viewed banning foods as tantamount to "lunacy." In a pair of letters to Jefferson just prior to adoption of the Constitution, Madison referred to a proposal by a segment of the Virginia legislature to ban the importation of foreign food and drink as beyond the power of any one state, beyond the rights of any national government, and "little short of madness." Madison also called the bill a "despotic measure" that required "the most despotic means" of enforcement. Taken together, Jefferson's denunciation of the "coercion" evident in France's potato ban and Madison's use of the words "lunacy," "madness," and "despoti[sm]" to describe the proposed Virginia ban show that (contra Mayor Bloomberg) leading Founding Fathers abhorred laws that would limit the rights of Americans to obtain the foods of their own choice.

Fourth, the proposed ban faces widespread opposition from diverse cross section of experts, advocates, public intellectuals, and media. Businesses of all sizes—in New York City and beyond—have spoken out against the proposed ban. Opponents of nanny-state prohibitions have likewise been vocal in their opposition to the ban. But the proposed ban has also faced withering criticism and hostility from some unexpected corners. Publications like U.S. News, The Nation, Washington Post, New York Times, Slate, and others have published editorials and op-eds blasting the proposed ban. Jon Stewart of The Daily Show joked the proposed ban "combines the draconian government overreach people love with the probable lack of results they expect." Law professor Jonathan Turley referred to the proposed ban as "facially absurd." Meanwhile, respected pollsters from Rasmussen to Quinnipiac find that New Yorkers and Americans more generally oppose the ban.

In conclusion, Keep Food Legal members and supporters oppose the Proposed Amendment of Article 81 (Food Preparation and Food Establishments) of the New York City Health Code, found in Title 24 of the Rules of the City of New York. The proposed ban would not achieve its stated goal of reducing obesity in New York City. Because its basis rests on a faulty premise, the proposed ban would likely have no positive impact on the health of New Yorkers. Furthermore, the negative intended and unintended consequences of the ban would be legion—and would likely include negative health, economic, environmental, and other costs felt in New York City and beyond. Furthermore, if previous efforts by New York City—including coerced menu labeling—had worked as promised, New Yorkers would be showing the positive health effects of these policies. The success of coerced menu labeling would have obviated the purported need to ban beverages of a certain size. Instead, studies have shown that forced menu labeling has had little or no impact on the food choices people make.

The public-health community—including DOHMH—has an important role to play in protecting the health of all Americans. But this community also rightly has no say over many of our most important health decisions—including mandating whether or how often we exercise, what time we must go to bed, or the identity of the sexual partners of consenting adults. Keep Food Legal urges DOHMH to similarly respect the rights of New Yorkers to make their own choices when it comes to selecting a beverage. New Yorkers, like all Americans, are at their best when they're most free.

Thank you for reviewing and considering the comments of Keep Food Legal and our members and supporters. I would be happy to offer further insight on these comments at your request.

New York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene
Board of Health
2 Gotham Center, 14th Floor
Long Island City, NY 11101-4132

To the Members of the Board of Health:

ChangeLab Solutions is pleased to provide input on the Proposed Amendment of Article 81 of the New York City Health Code. We create innovative law and policy solutions that transform neighborhoods, cities, and states. Our work is driven by a desire to ensure that everyone has safe places to live and be active, nourishing food, and more opportunities to be healthy. We applaud Mayor Bloomberg, the Department of Health and Mental Hygiene, and the Board of Health for taking such bold action against one of the drivers of the obesity epidemic.

Our comments are divided into two sections. In the first part, we provide a health disparities-focused rationale for regulating sugar-sweetened beverages (SSBs). In the second part, we provide comments on the legal and policy aspects of the proposal.

I. Overwhelming evidence points to the need to regulate SSBs.

In September 2011, ChangeLab Solutions (formerly Public Health Law & Policy) released Breaking Down the Chain: A Guide to the Soft Drink Industry, a report that illuminates the soft drink industry's manufacturing, distribution, and marketing practices.[1] This report contributed new information to the public health field about beverage companies' targeted marketing to people of color. Given New York City's diverse population and the high burden of diet-related chronic disease in communities of color, we focus our comments on the impact of SSBs on people of color.

Children and adolescents consume SSBs regularly. A recent CDC study found that 63% of high school students in the U.S. report consuming sugar-sweetened beverages on at least a daily basis.[2] In another study, 91% of children ages 6-11 consumed at least one sugar-sweetened beverage (such as fruit drinks, soda, sports drinks, or milk with added sugar) during the two-day interview period. The most common beverages consumed were fruit drinks and non-diet carbonated soft drinks.[3,4]

According to a 2008 report from the Federal Trade Commission, the major beverage companies spent nearly half a billion dollars marketing carbonated beverages to children and adolescents in the U.S. in 2006.[5] Companies spent an additional $147 million on marketing juice and non-carbonated drinks to children and adolescents. Beverage marketing accounted for 90% ($169 million) of food and beverage marketing in schools. And the beverage companies spent $101 million marketing carbonated soft drinks on television to youth, with most of that figure focused on teenagers. In addition to these marketing channels, the companies used Internet marketing, celebrity endorsements, and in-store packaging to reach children and adolescents.

The FTC report also provided examples of targeted marketing of beverages to youth of color. Companies reported the following practices: [6]

- Promoting soccer events to Hispanic youth
- Providing Spanish-language book covers in predominantly-Hispanic elementary schools
- Sponsoring basketball tournaments for African-American youth
- Sponsoring an essay contest for black history month for students of all ages

Beverage companies see youth, and especially youth of color, as the future of their businesses. For example, Martha Bermudez, senior manager of multicultural marketing at Pepsi-Cola North America, told a marketing trade publication: [7]

"It's important for us to reach young Latinos with messaging that is relevant and authentic because obviously they are the future for us."

We want these companies to be profitable in the future, but not to the detriment of children's health. Beverage companies have broad portfolios of products, including many that are no-calorie. Companies can certainly provide jobs and make profits if they focused marketing and manufacturing on their healthier products.

Adults also consume SSBs regularly. African-American and Hispanic adults have higher consumption rates of non-diet carbonated soft drinks, sports drinks, energy drinks, and some fruit beverages than the overall adult population. By contrast, white adults are more likely to report drinking diet carbonated soft drinks than African-Americans or Hispanics. African Americans and Hispanics constitute a large and growing market that soft drink marketers want to access. In order to reach these groups, industry leaders have created multicultural marketing teams to develop targeted campaigns that speak to the cultures and unique social norms of these groups.

Between January and September 2010, the major beverage companies spent $74 million on targeted marketing to Hispanics, with 70% of those dollars focused on network television advertising. A review of beverage advertising on Spanish-language network television between 2009 and 2010 found that 45% of beverage commercials promoted fruit drinks, 21% promoted non-diet carbonated soft drinks, and 18% promoted energy drinks. These three beverage categories are dominated by high-calorie drinks. During the same time period, beverage companies spent $53 million on targeted marketing to African Americans, with 53% of that sum focused on cable television. A review of beverage advertising on Black Entertainment Television (the only cable television station that exclusively targets African Americans) found that 33% of beverage commercials promoted non-diet carbonated soft drinks, 21% promoted energy drinks, and 20% promoted fruit drinks. Again, these three categories feature primarily high-calorie beverages.

Beverage companies continue to market high-calorie beverages that offer no nutritional value while obesity and diabetes rates soar. African-American and Hispanic adults have higher obesity and overweight rates than the overall U.S. population.[8] Disparities in obesity rates also exist for youth. Hispanic boys are more likely to have high BMIs than white boys. African-American girls are more likely to have high BMIs than white girls.[9] Obesity and overweight are risk factors for many chronic diseases, including diabetes. A frequently cited study of nurses' health over the course of eight years found that nurses who drank one or more SSBs per day were twice as likely to develop diabetes, as compared to nurses who did not consume SSBs frequently.[10] Hispanics and African Americans are 66% and 77%, respectively, more likely to develop diabetes than whites.[11]

Obesity and related chronic diseases are not the only public health problems linked to SSB consumption. Consuming SSBs is linked to dental decay, which causes pain and decreases quality of life for children.[12,13] In 2010, over $100 billion was spent on dental care in the United States, much of which could have been prevented.[14]

Critics of regulatory approaches to obesity prevention often say that health departments should focus on educating the public about healthy eating, increasing access to healthy food, and promoting physical activity. A comprehensive obesity prevention plan should include all of these strategies, as well as strategies to reduce consumption of unhealthy foods and beverages. A panel of health experts convened by the Institute of Medicine (IOM), a widely-respected nonpartisan organization, recently recommended a variety of strategies to "accelerate progress" in reducing U.S. obesity rates, including:

"Strategy 2-1: Adopt policies and implement practices to reduce overconsumption of sugar-sweetened beverages."[15]

New York City is leading the way on many of the strategies recommended by the IOM. It has implemented a hard-hitting public education campaign about SSBs, offered incentives to food retailers and mobile vendors to offer healthier food in underserved neighborhoods, and made it safer to walk and bike throughout the city. In order to address all factors contributing to obesity, the city also needs to implement policies to reduce consumption of SSBs, including limits on SSB serving sizes.

II. New York City has a duty and the legal authority to protect the health of its citizens.

For all the reasons set forth above, New York City has a duty to address the health risks posed by SSBs and the legal authority to do so under its broad police power.

Local governments are uniquely situated to provide for the health and welfare of their citizens. Recognizing this fact, the New York Constitution extends the broad police powers of New York to counties, cities, towns, and villages. Each local government is granted the "power to adopt and amend local laws . . . relating to" ... "[t]he government, protection, order, conduct, safety, health and well-being of persons or property." (NY Const. Art. 9, § 2; N .Y. Mun. Home. Rule § 10.)

Pursuant to this authority, New York City has a rich tradition of enacting laws to advance public health, and for over one hundred years, courts have consistently affirmed New York City's authority—and duty--- to legislate in this field. See, e.g., People v. Henry Maillard, Inc., 182 N.Y.S. 547 (1920) (holding that law in the Sanitary Code of the Board of Health of New York City "was in the interest of insuring proper and wholesome food, and its enactment was ...well within the police power of the enacting body."); Tenement House Dep't of City of New York v. Moeschen, 85 N.Y.S. 704, 707 aff'd, 179 N.Y. 325, aff'd, 203 U.S. 583, (1906) (holding that the New York City Legislature "has exercised the police power of the state, which, among the many objects over which it extends, applies with peculiar force to the preservation of the general health of the community."); Grossman v. Baumgartner, 17 N.Y.2d 345, 350-51 (1966)(Observing that "the main business of safeguarding the public health has always of necessity been done by local boards or officers through sanitary by-laws or ordinances which have been accorded the force of law.")(citations omitted).

New York City clearly has the legal authority to take this bold step to reduce consumption of SSBs. We believe that the SSB serving size policy could be even stronger if free refills were also prohibited. Allowing free refills undermines the goal of the policy --- to reduce consumption of SSBs --- and sends conflicting messages about how much of these beverages should be consumed during a meal.

III. Conclusion

As the evidence base linking consumption of sugar-sweetened beverages and obesity, overweight and chronic disease has grown, it is time to apply established legal principles to this new public health threat. We urge the Board of Health to protect the health of the millions of people who live and work in New York City by supporting this proposal. It will not only improve the health of New Yorkers, but also inspire action in health departments across the United States. If public health officials do nothing, the beverage industry will continue to profit off of the deteriorating health of our nation's youth and other vulnerable populations.

Thank you again for the opportunity to comment on this policy.

Comment: I wonder if the soda companies would ever consider exposing the truth about how unhealthy their beverages are for us? They wouldnt, of course, because if they did, people wouldnt buy sugar sweetened beverages. I am for the ban of oversized sugar sweetened beverages because the soda companies do not care about us - only their profit. Thank you dept of health for doing your job!

Comment:	As a restaurant owner, and mother of two little New Yorkers, I would like too see smaller servings, not only on drinks, but also fast food, therefore less sugar, obesity and health problems to this and next generations Although I tend to be against the idea of the Government interfering on this kind of issues, I believe that will be the only way to put an end to super sizes! I am for the rule establishing a maximum size of 16 ounces (which is already big anyway) Best, Paula Sorrentino

Comment:	If our elected officials are truly concerned about quality of life issues here in New York City, instead of creating rules that regulate the size of certain sugary drinks, why dont they do something that would have a greater impact on the overall quality of life, such as housing costs?

I can not believe that our elected officials can ignore what effect the high cost of housing has on the quality of life here in NYC while instead focusing on regulating sugary drink sizes. Are the people behind this absurdity for real? Are they truly this out of touch or are they only focused on issues that do not have an adverse effect on their own personal investment portfolios.

This is an insult to the intelligence of average New Yorkers and we truly deserve better representation!

Regulate housing costs, not sugary drink sizes!

Obviously our elected officials do not really care about quality of life issues, their focus is primarily geared toward items that do not adversely effect their own personal investment returns.

Shame on all of you that support such insanity at taxpayer expense!

Respectfully submitted,

David D. McEvoy

Comment: I am an educator and have been for the last 30 years. I am astonished that time and money is being spent to limit the amount of soda that a person can buy. Why cant we do something about the amount of alcohol that a person can consume? How many lives are lost or damaged because of alcohol and how much money is spent on that? I know all of the information is there, but we cant put a limit on that? What about tobacco? Why cant we make a law about to remove the sell of alcohol and tobacco since we know both of these kill millions and costs billions in health care costs?

healthfirst

To the New York City Board of Health:

Healthfirst is a not-for-profit health insurance plan that coordinates and pays for the care of close to 600,000 people in New York City. We strongly support Mayor Michael Bloomberg's initiative to limit the portion size of single serve sugary drinks sold at public establishments. We see both the human and financial costs of obesity on a daily basis – the compromised health and well-being of individuals, the terrible toll that diseases like diabetes take on individuals as well as their families, and the impediments to normal life suffered by obese individuals. Treating these conditions is expensive – an entire health care industry is growing up to treat obesity as well as obesity-related illnesses. And the call for obesity-related treatment is not limited to acute medical care; obese people who otherwise need long term care services at home, for example, need more home health aide support if they are obese because they have greater difficulty managing basic activities of daily living than their non-obese counterparts.

We and our primary care network are particularly alarmed at the rapid and increasing incidence of obesity in children. For this reason, Healthfirst is particularly supportive of the portion size proposal. Children are at risk of becoming obese and bearing the scourge of diabetes and related illnesses for their entire lives and society should do whatever it can to help them avoid this fate.

The health care costs related to obesity are staggering and are borne by the entire public in one way or another – through taxpayer-supported health insurance programs and direct support of building bariatric surgery suites and new obesity treatment centers, for example. At a time when dollars for public programs are more and more scarce, it is important to remember that funding spent in one area is not available to spend in others. To the extent we must spend more on the health-related consequences of obesity, for example, there is less to spend on primary care, affordable health insurance, education, and public transportation. We all pay for the health consequences of obesity.

The Mayor's initiative aims at the root cause of the problem by trying to reduce the incidence of obesity in the first place. It is an excellent start. We hope that New York City seizes the opportunity to lead the way through this non-coercive step that introduces some gentle reminders about portion control to consumers drinking sugary beverages.

Sincerely,

Pat Wang

Dear New York City Board of Health,

Us parents need to make this decision sir, not you! My family and myself do not drink soda that much but would like to keep this as our right to choose how much we would like to drink. This is our right! The only thing that we should do is teach our kids that too much soda is no good for them. The result is that my kids don't even like soda but this is their choice.

sincerely,

Dr. Thomas Farley
Commissioner
New York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene
125 Worth Street

Dear Commissioner Farley:

While we support New York City's efforts to address the obesity issue, we are concerned that singling out soda – or any food – as a unique contributor to obesity is misleading and actually does more harm than good. People suffering from overweight and obesity need to understand that there is no silver bullet or quick fix to achieving a healthy weight. Obesity is a complex issue, and as policy leaders, we must be careful not to send mixed messages about the solutions and remedies. The city is not going to address the obesity issue by attacking the soda industry alone because soda is not driving the obesity rates. In fact, sugar-sweetened beverages play a small and declining portion of the American diet – just 7 percent of total calories. With 93 percent of the average American's calories coming from other foods and beverages, the city has failed to look at the bigger picture.

Not only are we concerned about the health of individuals struggling with their weight, New York City's proposal would also have a devastating impact on food and beverage industry jobs. This proposal targets an industry that is responsible for creating more jobs than any other during this very difficult economic time. In May 2012, the food and beverage industry alone drove 37 percent of economic growth in the United States. We simply cannot afford to risk American jobs, especially on a proposal that the Mayor himself has said may not work to achieve the desired goal.

In addition, we live in a time when people of all political persuasions are losing confidence in government institutions to act in their best interest. Such distrust is harmful to a democratic society. When public policy solutions become fodder for late-night comedians, that trust is further eroded. A majority of New Yorkers believe that what they eat and drink should be their choice – not the government's. A NY1/Marist poll (June 2012) found that 53 percent of New Yorkers oppose this proposal, and a Rasmussen Reports poll (June 2012) found that 65 percent of American adults oppose a law that would ban the sale of any cup or bottle of sweetened drink larger than 16 ounces. Just 24 percent favor a law like the one New York City has proposed as a way to fight obesity. Certainly the government has played an important role over the years of educating the public about healthy eating and lifestyle choices, and we believe that is a more effective way to change public opinion and behavior.

We are a representative democracy, and our constituents have sent us a strong message: they do not want this. We agree that the government has a vested interest in having healthy citizens and we support a comprehensive plan for achieving that goal. However, we believe that the issue at hand is not whether the government is doing enough to address obesity, but whether we are doing all that we can as effectively as we can. We do not believe that this proposal is a means to that end.

It is our hope that moving forward, you will consider our concerns and the concerns of your constituents.

Sincerely,

Michael G. Grimm

Comment:	Sugary drinks should be avoided as they have no nutritional value. Research supports the notion that larger portion sizes increases the intake of food and beverages. I support Article 81 to help reduce portions and hopefully intake of these beverages in the American population. 58% of NYC adults are overweight or obese, and do not need excess calories from sugar sweetened beverages. Americans consume 200-300 more calories daily compared with 30 years ago, with the largest single increase due to sugary beverages.

THE Wendy's COMPANY
Quality is Our Recipe...Worldwide

July 24, 2012

New York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene
Board of Health
Office of the Secretary to the Board
Attention: Rena Bryant
2 Gotham Center, 14th Floor, Room 14-15, Box 31
Long Island City, NY 11101-4132

RE: Proposed Amendment of Article 81 (Food Preparation and Food Establishments) of the New York City Health Code, found in Title 24 of the Rules of the City of New York.

Dear Ms. Bryant:

I submit these comments, on behalf of The Wendy's Company, regarding the Department of Health and Mental Hygiene's proposal that the Board of Health amend Article 81 of the Health Code, related to the maximum size of sugary drinks and self-service beverage cups sold and offered in food service establishments.

The Wendy's Company is the world's third largest quick-service hamburger company. The Wendy's system includes more than 6,500 franchise and Company restaurants in the United States and 27 other countries and U.S. territories worldwide. Wendy's has approximately 50 restaurants in New York City.

First, Wendy's does not support this discriminatory and restrictive proposal. The proposed amendment applies to certain, but not all, foodservice establishments – many of which are competitors of Wendy's restaurants. For example, it doesn't apply to many convenience stores, which also sell soda. This is unfair and unreasonable.

The proposed amendment will unfairly burden local restaurants and could impose additional costs on consumers in New York City. Wendy's and only certain targeted foodservice establishments in New York City will be unfairly harmed by the loss of sales that could result from this overreaching proposal. This impacts both our company-owned locations and restaurants owned by franchisees, most of whom are small-business owners. The proposal is particularly objectionable because most convenience stores, grocery stores and other businesses are exempt from the proposed regulation. Effectively, the City of New York is discriminating against certain foodservice businesses to the benefit of others.

The proposal also unfairly limits consumer choice. We believe all restaurant customers should have the right to decide which products to purchase and not be arbitrarily limited by government intervention and overreaching. We believe our customers, including those in New York City, are best equipped to make the decisions that are right for themselves and their families.

Furthermore, there is no scientific data backing the Department's arbitrary decision to target beverages larger than 16 ounces in only a portion of the foodservice establishments in New York City. We believe health policy should be driven by facts, not anti-restaurant agendas. Since caloric substitutes are readily available and people consume calories from many foods and drinks, bans are unlikely to impact obesity. The notion that people switch from full-calorie to diet beverages is flawed and shows a lack of understanding of consumer behavior.

Obesity is a complex health issue and cannot be attributed to one single beverage or food. When it comes to losing and maintaining weight, all calories count, including those from beverages. However, it is wrong to single out any one food or beverage as causing obesity because people consume calories from many different sources. It is especially hypocritical to exclude those exact same beverages in convenience stores and other locations.

Wendy's supports consumer choice by providing a variety of beverage sizes. Today, we offer more than 18 beverage options in the U.S., including teas, milk, apple juice and water. This includes at least six low- and no- calorie beverages that can help consumers manage calorie intake.

In summary, this proposal restricts choice. Consumers deserve the freedom to make their own choices – especially in America.

We appreciate the opportunity to comment on the proposed amendment. We welcome the opportunity to provide additional information to any aspects of these comments.

Respectfully submitted,

John D. Barker
Senior Vice President and Chief Communications Officer

AuntieAnne's

389

Good afternoon. My name is Joe Hainthaler. I handle government affairs for Auntie Anne's, Inc., the world's largest franchisor of hand-rolled soft pretzels, and it is in that role that I address you today. We currently have 18 franchised locations in New York City, employing approximately 250 people. I want to thank the members of the New York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene and Commissioner Farley for this opportunity to testify.

I want to start out by saying that Auntie Anne's understands and shares the concern with obesity that prompted Mayor Bloomberg's proposal. And we are prepared to support the efforts of the mayor, the New York City Obesity Task Force and the Department of Health and Mental Hygiene in promoting healthier lifestyles.

But I hope to convince you today that this proposal has two significant problems: first, it is unfairly designed in a way which will more significantly impact the millions of small business people operating restaurants in New York City than their counterparts operating stores where less than 50% of their sales are from food products; and, second, it is unlikely to encourage healthier choices among consumers.

I will start with the unfairness of the proposal because that argument is simpler.

Imagine a potential Auntie Anne's guest who has worked up a thirst while touring this beautiful city.

She sees a convenience store with a display ad for a 40-ounce Super Big Gulp, next to an Auntie Anne's store, where she can purchase nothing larger than a 16-ounce lemonade.

Now, while as a loyal Auntie Anne's employee, I must conclude for the record that our tourist would simply not be able to resist a golden-brown Auntie Anne's pretzel, the convenience store would still enjoy an unfair advantage on the beverage side if this board adopts the mayor's proposal. The potential of two stores on the same block being held to different standards is inequitable and will stifle growth of small business within the city.

Fairness aside, I think there is convincing evidence from the Auntie Anne's system that indicates this policy possibly working against its own goal.

Between July 15, 2011 and July 15, 2012, 55 percent of our guests ordered either a sugary beverage of 16 ounces or less, or chose water, a 100 percent fruit juice or non-chocolate milk, the 45 percent of beverage sales that WOULD be affected by the size limit broke down as follows:

- 70 percent of the sales of lemonade, ICEE and non-diet soft drinks were either 20 or 22 ounces;
- 29 percent were 32 ounces; and
- only 1 percent were 42 or 44 ounces.

As I understand Mayor Bloomberg's rationale, the goal is to get people to think before they order larger sizes, in hopes that this forced consideration will lead them to opt for smaller sugary drinks. I would submit that the choices currently being made by most Auntie Anne's guests – for a 20- or 22-ounce drink – is pretty close to the proposal's goal, and less than the 32 ounces a guest would end up with if he or she chose two 16-ounce beverages to make up for the lack of a medium option.

Forcing a guest who wants 20 or 22 ounces to make a conscious decision to order two 16-ounce beverages might well lead to higher consumption of sugary beverages than is occurring now. And the current situation has the added benefit of leaving that choice to Auntie Anne's guests.

Auntie Anne's, Inc. therefore opposes the mayor's proposal to limit guests' beverage choices because of the inequity excluding convenience stores and other stores where 50% or less of its sales arise out of food sales, and, as the numbers on our customer choices indicate, probably won't steer a whole lot of our guests in the direction the mayor wants.

*Non-affected beverages include fruit juices, water and diet soft drinks.

Comment:	The crisis levels that obesity has reached are horrifying enough on their own. Still more alarming is the fact that in low-income and minority communities, the very communities that Restoration serves, these problems are even more rampant. For this reason, Restoration applauds Mayor Bloomberg's anti-obesity initiative and the move to reduce the consumption of sugary beverages.

Bedford Stuyvesant's health indicators underscore the need for initiatives like these: 41% of the neighborhood's youth are obese, compared to NYC's 23.4% average, and the related diabetes rates are similarly more pronounced in the area. It is no coincidence that soda consumption is also through the roof, with 38% of teens in Bedford Stuyvesant drinking soda daily, not to mention other sugar-sweetened beverages. As a community development corporation, Restoration's goal is to improve the quality of life in the Central Brooklyn communities we serve and, in so doing, to improve neighborhood outcomes as a whole. But this goal can only be realized through the implementation of systematic and environmental changes. Decreasing access to sugar's empty calories through policy change will help break this web of unhealthy lifestyle decisions, as well as facilitate the making of healthier choices. Moreover, Mayor Bloomberg's proposal will go miles in helping increase public ! awareness of obesity, of portion control, and ultimately, of healthier lifestyles.

Comment: Although the reasons for the obesity epidemic are complex, one cause is clear: obesity has increased due to a greater number of calories consumed than expended. While mammals have evolved to defend against famine, we recognize that too many calories and large portions seem to be putting us at greater risk for unhealthy levels of obesity without a compensatory mechanism to decrease weight when necessary.

Is the environment to blame for making it so difficult or is it the fact that we no longer have will power? In both children and adults, an increase in the portion sizes of food and/or caloric beverages has contributed to an increase in consumption, and therefore, an increase in calorie consumption. We now are beginning to understand why will power is not as successful a strategy as we had once hoped: people may not be able to biologically respond to excess energy intake as accurately as they once could when food was not so readily available. There is evidence that too many calories can harm brain cells making it more difficult for the brain to tell how much extra energy is stored. Research now suggests that overfeeding mice damages hypothalamic neurons that are part of the system responsible for sensing how much energy is stored, and how much food has been eaten. As a result, these mice gain more weight, further injuring the hypothalamic weight regulating system and beg! inning the "feed-forward" process of life-long weight gain in a way that has defied an easy solution. Sugar sweetened beverages contribute to this problem by hitting certain "feel-good" parts of the brain and by the fact that we do not compensate for the calories we drink in the same way that we seem to when we eat.
So is the environment to blame? When this effect on the brain is combined with the financial incentive to over consume as in the "value meal" concept, overconsumption may be difficult, if not impossible, to prevent.
In many large public venues such as movie theaters and stadiums in New York, the smallest portion of sugar-sweetened beverage available is 32 ounces, containing over 300 calories, and there is a strong price incentive to buy the heavily promoted sizes in the 40-60 ounce range. What is the consumer choice here, to use willpower if you don't want to drink that much? Suppose the consumer wants less? Critics of the mayor's proposal to make 16 ounces the largest size beverage complain that they will lose their freedom of choice. I see the proposal as a win for consumer freedom. Think about it: our children will finally be able to buy a more normal, 2 serving sized beverage when they go to the movies. Anyone who chooses to have more can buy another beverage. Or the 2 or 3 more it takes to make up the currently available sizes.

RYAN CENTER
William F. Ryan Community Health Center

Mayor Bloomberg
City Hall
New York, New York 10007

Dear Mayor Bloomberg:

On behalf of the William F. Ryan Community Health Network, we are writing to express our enthusiastic support for the proposed amendments to the New York City Health Code that would establish maximum sizes for sugary beverages offered and sold in food service establishments. We believe that these proposed regulations are sensible, are based upon current clinical evidence concerning the dangers of excess sugary drinks, and are definitely within the purview of the Department of Health and Mental Hygiene (DOHMY) mandate to protect public health by encouraging healthy choices and minimizing potentially deleterious health habits.

The obesity epidemic in New York City, with its devastating consequences for the health and well being of its citizens—especially its youngest and most vulnerable citizens—is well known, and requires the decisive action proposed by the DOHMH. As a leading driver of the obesity epidemic, sugary drinks are being consumed in increasingly excessive quantities, which are directly related to the unreasonably large portions being made available at venues frequented by people who are at greatest risk of suffering the long-term health consequences of these drinks. We also fully agree with you on framing this issue as a public health threat, and with your reasoned and articulate ripostes to specious arguments that try—incorrectly—to frame this urgent matter as one of civil liberties.

The Ryan Network is proud of its ongoing efforts to counter obesity, especially among its pediatric and adolescent patients, many of whom are medically underserved and often lack the psychosocial support to make informed, healthy choices about their daily nutritional needs. We applaud you and the DOHMH for this extremely important initiative, which will result in improved health for all New Yorkers.

Sincerely,

Barbra E. Minch

Re: Comment on: Article 81 - Food Preparation and Food Service Establishments

The American Society for Metabolic and Bariatric Surgery (ASMBS and the New York State Chapter of the ASMBS appreciate the efforts of Mayor Bloomberg to ban the sale of sugar-sweetened beverages larger than 16 ounces. Consumption of sugar-sweetened beverages, which research shows are a major contributor to increased calorie intake by both children and adults, is one of many factors contributing to our country's rising obesity epidemic.

Obesity is a multifactorial chronic disease requiring a comprehensive approach to both prevent and treat. Obesity is a major contributor to a large number of preventable deaths in the United States and it carries with it a large number of related conditions such as type 2 diabetes, hypertension, heart disease, certain cancers, sleep apnea and arthritis. Therefore, care should not be seen as simply having the goal of reducing body weight, but should additionally be focused on improving overall health and quality of life.

Although obesity is caused by myriad of factors, there is a large body of evidence suggesting that a significant contributor to consumption of extra calories over the last three decades is the over-consumption of sugar-sweetened beverages including soda, sports and energy drinks, fruit drinks, and enhanced waters. Research indicates that Americans consume nearly 200-300 more calories per day than 30 years ago, with the largest single increase in calories due to sugar-sweetened beverages. In addition, overconsumption of sugary drinks leads to increased weight gain, blood sugar and lipids (cholesterol) (triglycerides).

We believe Mayor Bloomberg's approach to this issue is both innovative and practical. In the 1960s, Americans enjoyed their soda or "pop" in 6 ½ ounce bottles. However, over the last five decades, the portion size for sugar-sweetened beverages has ballooned to 20-ounce drinks in vending machines and 20-32 ounce drinks in chain stores and restaurants. The New York initiative specifically targets this problem – aiming to bring serving sizes of these beverages back to a more reasonable range.

Working together, health care professionals, patients and policymakers can have a profound impact on how we, as a nation, support healthy environments and food choices for the more 92 million Americans who struggle with obesity. We applaud Mayor Bloomberg and the New York City Health Department for proposing this policy and encourage other policymakers around the country to take note!

As the proprietor of two stores, I object strenuously to the proposed limitation on cup size.

Fighting obesity is a worthy cause, but the proposed rule is too arbitrary to be good policy. Obesity has many causes; singling out sodas ignores a host of other culprits. Why not limit consumers to one donut or, for that matter, one drink in the evening? What about the high calorie drinks offered at Starbucks? Anything other than a black coffee is spiked with sugar.

Moderation is admirable and desirable. But the fact is that, under the proposed rule, my customers will be able to go to the supermarket, buy gallons of soda and drink them immediately. This penalizes me and my business, and offers an unfair advantage to businesses not regulated by the DOMHH.

Please don't do this.

Pastor Brian L. Carter, MPA

New York City's low-income residents expect their elected officials to protect them from unscrupulous industry practices that put profits above the health and well-being of our communities. The City's proposal to limit the size of sugary drinks satisfies this principle.

Adults in the city's poorest neighborhoods suffer from obesity and diabetes at twice the rate of the wealthiest New Yorkers, and bear the disproportionate burden of diabetes-related hospitalizations and deaths. Diabetes, the fourth leading cause of death in NYC, is more common in NYC Adults than across the US: in NYC 9.7% vs. 8.7% rate and a prevalence of 13% in our low-income neighborhoods (NYCDOHMH, 2009). Equally disconcerting is the evidence that obese is rising at a rapid pace. NYCDOHMH (2009) reports revealed that whereas 18% of adults in 2002 were considered to be obese it had changed to 23% in 2009. Moreover, 57% of the NYC population is obese with two-thirds living in low-income communities. Furthermore, there is evidence that this trend begins in the earlier years of childhood. We know that the consumption of sugar-sweetened beverages fuels these epidemics.

Health Department research shows that our poorest residents consume significantly more sugar-saturated drinks than our most affluent: 38% versus 19% of adults, respectively; and 51% versus 31% of children. The daily caloric intake from sugar sweetened beverages, Health Department Data shows, has almost tripled since 1977 from 60 to 180 calories per capita per day. Moreover, the child's risk of becoming obese, according to NYC Health Department Data, increases by about 60% for each additional daily sugar sweetened beverage. Also, women increase their risk of diabetes by 83%, stated Schulze, Manson, Ludwig, Colditz, Stampfer, and Willett (2004), with a high consumption of soft drinks. The alarming fact, argued Wang, Bleich, and Gortmaker (2008), is that just one extra soda a day contains enough calories to produce an annual weight gain of 15 pounds. Furthermore, a 20 ounce bottle of soda, posited Wang, Bleich, and Gortmaker (2008), has 16½ teaspoons of sugar that translate into about 250 calories. Frankly, the best argument for limiting the consumption of sugary drinks is that it's good public health.

Elected officials are charged with the ethical responsibility to protect the health of the public and reduce the disease burden among the most vulnerable among us. Therefore, the argument advance by opponents that the restriction of beverage size unfairly stigmatizes the poor is hollow. In fact, it will ease an unfair burden on the poor of being the helpless victims of an industry where profits trump good health. Moreover, it takes little effort to cry stigma rather than defy the popular and make the right, although unwelcomed choice.

The ecumenical community will continue to work with government and public health agencies to reduce rates of obesity and diabetes in our most disadvantaged neighborhoods. City officials will be doing what we elected them to do: fighting for our right to a longer and healthier life.

Comment:	As a scientist, there is evidence that excess calories, such as those in sugar-sweetened beverages are a major contributor to the obesity epidemic. We must change the culture and the environment to make it supportive of healthy behaviors if we are to make progress in this area. Individual-level interventions have not had the impact that we want. It is time to think differently.

Comment: This is only going to increase the price that soda will cost. I personally only purchase a larger soda when I share it at a restaurant. Now I will have to purchase 2 separate sodas, resulting in a greater cost and total amount of soda consumed.

People who consume more than 16 oz at once, will likely be purchasing a second soda in the end and will end up consuming an even larger amount of sugar/soda. (32 ounces instead of 20!)

Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg & Members of the New York City Board of Health
City Hall

Dear Mayor Bloomberg and Members of the New York City Board of Health,

As I said when you visited our Bethesda, MD office with Governor O'Malley in 2010, I have been a longtime admirer of your entrepreneurial spirit and commitment to acting on your principles. Having launched Honest Tea 14 years ago with 5 thermoses and a belief that consumers were thirsty for a lower-calorie natural and organic beverage, I can appreciate all you have accomplished. However, I write today as an entrepreneur frustrated by a proposal that arbitrarily complicates the practical realities of commerce.

When you announced your proposal to ban sugar-sweetened drinks in portions over 16 oz. from New York City restaurants, many of my friends assumed Honest Tea would welcome the news as a public initiative to complement Honest Tea's longstanding commitment to marketing lower-calorie drinks. Yet your proposal would actually prevent Honest Tea from selling most of our drinks in New York City restaurants.

Under your plan, restaurants would not be able to sell packages larger than 16 ounces for drinks that have more than 25 calories per 8 ounce serving. Honest Tea's top-selling item is our organic Honey Green Tea, which has 35 calories per 8 ounce serving and is in a 16.9 oz. bottle. We label 70 calories on the front of the package so consumers know what's in the full bottle. We initially went with 16.9 oz. (which is 500 milliliters) because it is a standard size that our bottle supplier had in stock at the time. We subsequently invested several hundred thousand dollars for 16.9 oz. bottle molds. Is 16.9 oz. the perfect size? Who knows? As a beverage marketer, we willingly submit to the unforgiving judgment of the market – what we did not anticipate was an arbitrary decision to constrain consumer choice.

One response we considered was putting .9 ounce less liquid in our bottles, but that would create a separate set of complications. We fill our bottles to the brim – not just because we like to deliver an "Honest" value, but to also ensure quality since we do not use preservatives. Then there is the costly prospect of having to change all of our UPC codes because we would be offering a different liquid volume.... all for .9 ounces! And what if next year, Cambridge, MA comes up with a ban on 15.5 ounce containers? As soon as government starts getting between us and the consumer, we quickly find ourselves considering scenarios that are not based on market realities or consumer needs.

I hope that you and the New York City Board of Health will seriously consider the challenges entrepreneurs already face in our efforts to offer lower-calorie drinks. Starting a business and building a challenger brand with modest resources is already a daunting task. The proposed ban would create additional barriers to beverage innovation.

Honestly Yours,

New York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene Board of Health Office of the Secretary to the Board
2 Gotham Center, 14th Floor, Room 14-15, Box 31 Long Island City, NY 11101-4132

Dear Ms. Bryant:

Thank you for the opportunity to comment on Proposed Amendment of Article 81 (Food Preparation and Food Establishments) of the New York City Health Code, found in Title 24 of the Rules of the City of New York. I am a public health dentist and a professor of dentistry at the Columbia University College of Dental Medicine and an attending dentist a service director at the New York Presbyterian Hospital. I have been actively involved in setting up school-based health clinics throughout Washington Heights/ Inwood and Central Harlem. Acidic and sweetened soft drinks contribute to dental decay. Dental cavities are a preventable disease. Unfortunately, dental tooth infections are the most common infection of our children. The use of large sweetened drinks is a significant contributing factor to this unfortunate and preventable epidemic. The amount of soft drink consumed today is three times more than it was 20 years ago. Children today drink twice as much soft drink than milk. The cost to repair decayed to teeth is significant. In addition, decayed teeth can lead to a lifetime of disability and inability to communicate effectively. Children with cavities are often in pain and can't participate in the school environment.

The sugar in soft drinks combines with decay producing bacteria to form an acid that attacks the tooth enamel and root surfaces. In addition, the acid in soda pop also erodes the tooth enamel and root surfaces. Every time you drink a sweetened drink the bacteria produce acid that attacks the tooth surface for at least 20 minutes. Sipping on large drinks prolongs this acid attack, resulting in erosion and destruction of the tooth surface. Children and teenagers are particularly vulnerable to decay caused by soft drinks because their teeth are not fully developed and are still maturing. For adults the effects of erosion are profound. The acid from soft drinks erodes the enamel surface over time the enamel is lost, leading to sensitivity and pain. Sensitivity and pain on teeth are the most common oral health concerns. In a recent study that I conducted at Columbia University we found that many adults miss work because of sensitivity and pain. The erosion of the enamel surface is particularly problematic as there are no simple restorative options to bring the mouth back to good health. Large soft acidic soft drinks are a significant contributor to this problem. Unfortunately, most consumers are not aware of the hazards of drinking large quantities of acidic drinks. Limiting the size of soft drinks and public education programs would benefit the oral health of New Yorkers.

Sincerely,

It is an honor and pleasure to speak before you today. I am a public health economist who for the past 25 years has been studying the relationship between prevention, economic productivity, and policy. My recent experience includes estimating the health and economic effects of tobacco cessation policy and community-based programs in New York City[1], and the potential for health and economic gains among seniors attending senior centers in NYC, associated with evidence-based programs for health promotion and disease prevention.[2]

The devastating consequences of obesity have far-reaching effects. Others today have testified on the health consequences of obesity which include diabetes, cancer, heart disease, arthritis, depression, and asthma. My purpose is to briefly address the economic consequences of obesity. These consequences affect not only those persons who face serious health threats associated with obesity, but also their families, neighbors, employers, and society as a whole.

Productivity, economic and otherwise, is reduced among those whose healthy lifespan is cut short due to premature morbidity. Economic productivity is also reduced among working family members and friends who must care for their loved ones, e.g. the diabetic who has suffered an amputation, or the person with heart disease who has suffered a stroke. This loss of productivity reduces economic potential and growth. Finally, as a society, we face substantial increases in the marginal costs associated with the preventable health consequences of obesity. These preventable costs result in increased insurance premiums and taxes for everyone.

The economic consequences are not trivial. In original research at the CUNY School of Public Health, my colleagues and I estimated that diabetes alone accounts for $2.8 billion (2012 dollars) in hospital costs for New Yorkers aged 60 and over. These huge costs are the tip of the ice-berg, as this estimate does not include all other costs associated with diabetes, including outpatient physician visits, pharmacy, homecare, transportation, and medical equipment. Moreover, the $2.6 billion estimate is highly conservative as the enormous human costs associated with pain and suffering by hospitalized patients and their families are not included.

Yet diabetes is only one consequence of obesity. In an article published in the American Journal of Health Promotion in 1998[3], the economic cost of obesity to U.S. business was estimated. Updating those figures to 2012 dollars, and adjusting for the increased prevalence of obesity over the past 15 years yields a rough estimate of over $30 billion. As the biggest regional economy in the US, New York City business bears a disproportionate share of these costs. In a more recent estimate, obesity-related absenteeism costs employers as much as $6.4 billion a year as calculated by a health economist Duke University, Eric Finkelstein[4].

Obesity has other consequences. Numerous studies have shown that the obese are less likely to be hired and promoted than the nonobese. Women in particular bear the brunt of that, earning about 11 percent less than women of healthy weight, according to health economist John Cawley of Cornell University. At the average weekly U.S. wage of $669 in 2010, that's a $76 weekly obesity tax, born disproportionately among women of color.

Finally, in an article published in the Journal of Health Economics in January 2012[5], estimates show obese men average an additional $1,152 per year in medical spending, and obese women average an additional $3,271 in medical spending. These figures lead to a startling $190 billion per year in additional medical spending as a result of obesity, accounting for over 20% of US expenditures. Thus the NYCDOHMH estimates that obesity is costing annually over $4 billion in direct medical costs in NYC. We have learned from tobacco control that changing social norms is effective in changing behavior. As a way to address the obesity epidemic, and reduce excess and unnecessary economic costs, the reduction in size of allowable sugar drink containers seems a reasonable and responsible public health intervention.

Thank you for the opportunity to speak with you today. I am happy to answer any questions.

regarding

Article 81 – Food Preparation and Food Service Establishments

Long Island City, NY 11101

Good afternoon and thank you to the members of the Board of Health for the opportunity to speak today about Article 81 – Food Preparation and Food Service Establishments – also known as the proposal to limit some sugar-sweetened beverage purchases to sixteen ounces.

My name is Sheelah Feinberg, and I am the Executive Director of the NYC Coalition for a Smoke-Free City. We are an organization based in each borough that has worked with more than one hundred health and youth focused community groups to raise awareness around tobacco control and prevention. It has been said that sugar is "the new tobacco." I'm here today to address that comparison directly.

The Coalition and its partners are grateful to have a Mayor who is committed to improving public health, and our combined efforts have yielded unprecedented success. Thanks to bold policies, higher cigarette taxes, hard-hitting media campaigns, and cessation services to help smokers quit, we have reduced smoking in New York City to an historic low of 14%.[1] This means thousands of lives saved, increased life expectancy, and improved health for all New Yorkers.

With this success, tobacco will soon no longer be the number one cause of preventable death and disease in New York. However, this immense achievement is bittersweet, as it is not only because of tobacco control efforts, but also because of the sharp rise of obesity. Sugary beverages are the primary source of excess calories in our diets and a main culprit in this new epidemic. Currently, 58% of New York City residents are overweight or obese, which is a shocking 3.4 million people.[2] Similar to tobacco use, obesity rates are highest among low-income New Yorkers, Latinos, and African-Americans.[3] Tobacco and soda companies both aggressively target these populations in their marketing.[4]

Tobacco and soda companies spend hundreds of millions of dollars in New York State each year marketing their products to youth. It is no coincidence that 90% of smokers start before their eighteenth birthday,[5] and adult obesity is often tied to habits learned during childhood. When 21% of New York City youth enter adulthood already obese, we are setting them up for a lifetime of preventable health problems and disease.[6] New York spends $8 billion annually on health care costs directly related to tobacco use[7] and $11 billion related to obesity.[8] We cannot afford the loss of life or the economic burden caused by these preventable diseases.

New York City was considered a public health pioneer when we passed the 2002 Smoke-Free Air Act in spite of negative press coverage and big spending by big tobacco to defeat the proposal. Now it is the soda companies' turn. They are spending tens of millions of dollars nationwide to defeat proposed taxes and regulations on their products. We encourage the Board to weigh science and health more heavily than a well-funded P.R. campaign. Changing social norms takes time and you have to start somewhere. For decades, public health advocates have worked tirelessly so that Fred Flintstone cannot promote Winston cigarettes, people can no longer smoke on planes, and New York City bars, restaurants, and public parks are all smoke-free.

Some critics say that instead of restricting the amount of soda people can buy, the City should simply provide more education. Education is indeed a critical part of improving public health, but it is only one element of what must be a comprehensive, multi-pronged approach. This proposal is similar to successful tobacco control policy because it is, in and of itself, community education. The attention and media coverage around portion size has been tremendous for raising awareness around the health impact of excessive sugar consumption. That's why policy change is such an effective public health tool – it works.

In closing, both tobacco use and excessive sugar consumption cause hundreds of thousands of preventable deaths in the United States each year. Raising awareness is not enough. Education alone will not lead to significantly lower obesity rates, much like simply knowing the deadly health effects of cigarettes did not lead to historic declines in smoking. Along with education, we need bold approaches such as the proposed limit on sugar-sweetened beverages to combat obesity. In doing so, New York City can continue to be a public health pioneer and lead the way for the rest of the country around sugar and obesity - just as it did with tobacco control.

Thank you.

Testimony of David R. Jones

President and CEO, Community Service Society

New York City Board of Health

Thank you for inviting me to address the Board on the crucial subject of obesity in New York City – especially obesity among our young people.

I support Mayor Bloomberg's proposal to help curb obesity and its collateral diseases by prohibiting restaurants, sports venues, street vendors, and movie theaters from serving sugary drinks larger than 16 ounces.

Obesity is a leading cause of preventable death, second only to tobacco. It kills 5,800 New York City residents a year.[i] Being overweight or obese is now the norm in our city: 58 percent of adults – or a total of 3,437,000 people – are overweight or obese.[ii]

Obesity is a major problem for New York's young people. A recent report by the U.S. Center for Disease Control and Prevention found that: "Childhood obesity continues to be a leading public health concern that disproportionately affects low-income and minority children. Children who are obese in their preschool years are more likely to be obese in adolescence and adulthood and to develop diabetes, hypertension, and asthma."[iii]

Nearly 40 percent of the city's public school students (K-8th grade) are obese or overweight.[iv] The beverage industry and its advertising campaigns prey upon these most vulnerable young people. Sugary drinks - along with cigarettes and malt liquor – are disproportionately marketed to the city's poor neighborhoods, mostly communities of color. These drinks are a major cause of overweight and obesity.[v]

And the obesity epidemic strikes hardest in communities already suffering from health and economic disparities, particularly our black, Latino and low-income communities where the rate of overweight and obesity reaches 70 percent in some neighborhoods.[vi] The high incidences of diabetes, heart disease, high blood pressure, and stroke in these communities attest to the unhealthy diets promoted by the purveyors of fast, cheap food and drinks that permeate these neighborhoods.

When Michael Harrington wrote about the poor being "fat with hunger" in his seminal work "The Other America," he meant the cheap food and sugary drinks without nutritional value that are peddled in poor neighborhoods.[vii]

Residents of primarily black and Latino neighborhoods - East and Central Harlem, North and Central Brooklyn, and the South Bronx - are more likely to drink sugary drinks, and to drink four or more sugary drinks daily, than are white residents of the Upper West Side and Flatbush.[viii] The results are catastrophic.

The toll of obesity and resulting diabetes is striking New Yorkers unequally. Residents of Bedford Stuyvesant or East New York are four times more likely than a resident of the Upper East Side to die of diabetes. Black New Yorkers are almost three times more likely, and Latinos twice as likely, as whites to die from diabetes.[ix]

Obesity not only damages the lives of individuals; it costs us billions in higher health costs and lost productivity each year. The mayor has pointed out that treating obesity-related diseases costs $4 billion a year.[x]

The supersizing of sugary drinks, which has become a routine over the years, is played down by the beverage industry. Beverages at McDonald's have increased by 457 percent since 1955, from seven fluid ounces to 32 fluid ounces.[xi] Why? The beverage industry will tell you it's what the consumers want. The truth is that the industry's profits are driving these larger and larger drinks. It costs the beverage companies pennies to provide ever larger sugary drinks while their profit margins jump exponentially.

The beverage industry has responded to the mayor's proposal with an advertising campaign suited to the candidates running for president. There have been television ads extolling their products. Our mail boxes are being stuffed with flyers, ostensibly from "New Yorkers for Beverage Choices," but paid for by the American Beverage Association, trumpeting "freedom of choice," as if drinking a supersized soda is enshrined in the Bill of Rights. The cost of their campaign is in the millions.

In an act of supreme cynicism, those who oppose the ban on supersized drinks adopted the "Million Man March" concept for a City Hall rally a few weeks ago. They called it the "Million Big Gulp March," and they had the nerve to try to equate their "liberty" to consume supersized sugary drinks with the struggle for civil rights in America.

Some have argued that legislation or government action cannot take the place of personal responsibility in what we do to our bodies. But that has proven false when we see the declining number of smokers in the city after smoking bans in restaurants and parks.

Government has a compelling interest in preventing obesity and its complications which justifies limiting the size of sugary drinks in food service establishments. The Health Code restricts other commercial products to benefit public health, including bans on lead in paint and trans fats in foods. A recent study by the city's Department of Health and Mental Hygiene reveals that the ban on trans fats has had an effect on the healthier consumption of restaurant food, especially fast foods.[xii]

While banning supersized sugary drinks alone won't do the job, it's a step in the right direction. The ban requires the approval of the Board of Health. The Board should move forward and adopt the mayor's proposal.

Testimony at the NYC Department of Health & Mental Hygiene Public Hearing regarding Proposal to Amend Article 81

Good afternoon, distinguished members of the Board of Health. My name is Robert Jackson, Council Member for the 7th District in Manhattan and Chair of the City Council's Education Committee, as well as Co-Chair of the Black, Latino and Asian Caucus. Today you are conducting a public hearing on the proposal for the City's anti-obesity initiative including the proposal to limit the size of sugary drinks sold in food service establishments to 16 ounces or less. I want to thank you for the opportunity to share my serious concerns about the proposed ban on sugary drinks over 16 ounces.

I was born in New York City, where my wife and I raised our children. We are a City that through education and proper resources can take care of itself and knows right from wrong. Which is why Mayor Bloomberg's anti-obesity initiative, known as the soda ban proposal, is wrong for our City. While I understand Mayor Bloomberg's goal to reduce obesity, he is taking a wrong and dangerous turn.

This ban undermines New Yorkers' personal freedoms and will impact the economic viability of local small businesses that are the backbone of some of the most diverse and vulnerable neighborhoods.

I recently toured my district, speaking with business owners and residents, where I asked for their opinion on the proposed ban. They told me, loud and clear: We are New Yorkers. We do not need anyone to tell us what size soft drink we can sell or buy in our restaurants, pizza shops, etc.

Sam, who owns the Quick Bite on Amsterdam Avenue, told me he thinks this ban is unfair. He wouldn't be able to sell 20 oz. soft drinks, while the pharmacy chain store next door can. That's not fair, and ultimately it means that small family-owned businesses, already under tremendous pressure can't compete. It may mean they can't hire workers, give employees raises or expand their business. At a time of economic uncertainty, we should be helping small business grow, instead of piling on additional restrictions. And Sam is worried –"Now it's soda, what's next?"

Yorker and she asked me to stand up against this outrageous ban. She said "Only God can dictate to me what I can and cannot do and he (Bloomberg) is not God."

The inequity doesn't stop there. As a New York City Council Member, I have always advocated in the interest of all New Yorkers.

I respect the Mayor's intentions, but many of my colleagues and I firmly believe we and our constituents deserve a voice in this decision. The members of the Board of Health, whom the mayor himself appointed, should not have the sole authority to decide whether to restrict the food and soft drink choices available to New York City consumers.

The bottom line is that consumers do not need Mayor Bloomberg or any mayor to tell them what to drink or what size. New Yorkers have the right to make their own decisions. We live in the United States of America, land of the free, home of the brave and the land of opportunity; where democracy reigns. We do not live in a dictatorship.

I am fully aware of the toll obesity and chronic disease takes. I can confidently state that enacting this ban would be a misstep in the fight against obesity in New York City. The push to restrict the freedoms of New Yorkers by irresponsibly blaming sugary soft drinks for the obesity epidemic will do both, economic and social, harm to our great city; while having, in my opinion, no positive impact on the overarching push for healthier New Yorkers. Educational outreach in our schools, community based organizations, religious institutions and public service announcements are needed to inform people that they can live healthier lifestyles by eating healthy foods, exercising on a regular basis and drinking plenty of water.

While we discuss links between sugary drinks and diet and obesity, we seem to be forgetting one very important part of the health equation - exercise. Most of our kids are not getting enough. It is well known that the New York City Department of Education is failing to meet its mandated physical education requirements in many of its 1700 schools. Part of this is due to budgetary decisions and also due to choices, choices to make test preparation and test taking a priority at the expense of other necessary requirements, such as basic gym. Now, we cannot claim to be so worried about obesity and health without addressing the need for physical education in the lives of school kids.

I will continue to speak out against legislative, rules and regulations that threatens the freedom of choice, economic prosperity and the equality of all New Yorkers.

I hope you will truly listen to the voices of the business owners, New Yorkers and elected officials here today, making their opposition known. I respectfully urge this Board to vote NO on this proposed ban.

Thank you.

24 July 2012

I want to preface my comments by stating that I am speaking on behalf of myself only.

I am here in support of the proposed amendment of Article 81 of the New York City Health Code to limit the maximum size of sugary drinks and self-service beverage cups sold in food service establishments.

Let me begin with a quote from, "The public health and economic benefits of taxing sugar-sweetened beverages" that appeared in the New England Journal of Medicine in October, 2009 and which Dr. Farley was one of the authors, "Seat-belt legislation and tobacco taxation do not eliminate traffic accidents and heart disease but are nevertheless sound policies. Similarly, obesity is unlikely to yield to any single policy intervention, so it is important to pursue multiple opportunities to obtain incremental gains."

In that regard, New York City has pursued multiple avenues to address the obesity epidemic. Interventions to address dietary change – a foundation of weight loss treatment as well as an important first step in the treatment of diabetes and often cardiovascular disease – have included the posting of calorie information on restaurant menus and menu boards and two years after implementation a modified version became federal law in 2010. More recently, an attempt was made by Mayor Bloomberg to trial the exclusion of sugar-sweetened beverage purchases by those enrolled in SNAP. And now, an attempt is being made to control the size of a single unit of sugary drinks.

So, what are the pros and cons?

The pros for limiting portion size:

1 – will provide a supportive environment in contrast to the "supersize" and "all-you-can-eat" environments that encourage excess consumption. Lack of a supportive environment is often cited as one of the contributing factors to the obesity epidemic.

2 – may provide a "teachable" moment for someone to pause and use the monies saved on a more nutritious choice rather than another soda. At the Burger King on East 86th Street on the Upper East Side, a 40-ounce cola costs $2.49 whereas a 16-ounce cola (the smallest beverage size available) only costs $1.29. With the $1.20 cost difference a person could wander outside to the produce cart on the block and purchase one of the following choices for only a dollar with 20 cents to spare: four bananas, a one pound package of baby carrots, two large cucumbers, two nectarines or peaches, three plums or two zucchini, as well as mushrooms.

3 – will provide a supportive environment for a diabetic to think twice about consuming another sugar-sweetened soda, thereby improving their degree of poorly controlled diabetes.

4 – may have a positive impact on those with a low HDL-cholesterol and/or high triglycerides.

5 – may have a positive impact on dental disease.

And finally,

6 – may have a positive impact on someone with respiratory distress, including asthma. When such a person exceeds their caloric needs, for example, by drinking too much sugar-sweetened beverages, their symptoms may be worsened because of the high respiratory quotient of carbohydrates.

As for the cons:

I cannot think of one. However, as per a recent conversation with a friend, she felt, as do some, that limiting the portion size of sugary beverages interferes with a person's constitutional right of freedom of choice. That's a far stretch of a "con" to this amendment.

This amendment DOES NOT impact on freedom of choice as a person can purchase as many portions of sugary beverages as desired.

What this amendment does by limiting the portion size is returning to a time when portion sizes were smaller as will be addressed by my colleague in the next presentation. As I am sure you are familiar with, the concept of limiting the portion sizes of calorie dense foods is not such a new concept although New York City is the first to attempt implementation of this. In the May issue of the CDC's journal, Preventing Chronic Disease, an article entitled, "Addressing the proximal causes of obesity: the relevance of alcohol control policies," included "Default portion sizes could be applied to all foods, but maximum serving sizes should be set for foods that are high in calories and low in nutritional value such as sugar-sweetened beverages and deep fried foods."

So to conclude, I not only endorse this amendment, but, if you are challenged in court as was the case with the posting of calories on menus in 2006, then do as you did then and make modifications, as necessary, so that this can be implemented. And, continue with your innovative attempts to improve the public health. With that, I encourage you to pursue the issues addressed in the USDA's refusal to permit a trial of Mayor Bloomberg's recommendation to modify SNAP benefits. I addressed this at the closing "Town Hall" session of the CDC's Weight of the Nation conference in May and for which I received applause from the audience. It's a step in the right direction to redesign SNAP so that it operates like WIC. I am confident that New York City can succeed!

Thank you.

Hello, my name is Brian Elbel, and I'm on the faculty at the New York University School of Medicine, in the Department of Population Health, as well as the NYU Wagner School of Public Service. My academic research focuses on the impact that public policies have on health, and in particular I examine obesity and obesity policies. Today, I will focus my remarks on what the research tells us the impact of the New York City Soda Policy you are considering today might be. I think all four pieces of evidence that I'll talk about today point to the soda policy potentially having a positive impact on the health of the public.

First, to touch on portion size and its influence of the amount of food that individuals consume: We know from multiple studies that the portion size that is served to consumers very much influences how much they actually consume. To highlight some of our own work, published this year in the journal Health Affairs, when consumers at a fast food restaurant were offered a smaller portion of a side dish, they consumed fewer total calories. When the received the larger portion, they consumed the entire amount and took in more total calories. The bottom line is that everyone "cleaned their plate". Other studies have shown this as well, both for adults and children, and even for foods that don't taste very good—how much we consume is hugely influenced by the portion in front of us.

Second, the power of changing the default option, and the hassle factor: Consumers respond to what the "default" choice is, or the option that is the path of least resistance. This has been shown in many domains outside of health, and is likely to have a large influence in the health domain as well. This policy makes 16 ounces the default. Related to this is the larger "hassle factor." We know that convenience drives many food purchases, particularly fast food purchases. If it becomes harder to carry two or more cups, people will be less likely to do so.

Third, we know that price is a factor in the decision individuals make about which foods and beverages to consume. While of course we can't say for sure what will happen with price, if one result of this policy is that the price of sugared beverages relative to other, healthier beverages increases, then this could also lead to improvements in obesity.

Fourth, and finally, we have recently completed some work looking directly at the potential impact of the soda policy. This work was released online just yesterday by the New England Journal of Medicine and will appear in a subsequent print issue. It focuses on the potential impact of the soda policy on purchases of caloric beverages particularly at fast food restaurants. To do this, we used data collected from consumers at fast food restaurants through a project funded by the National Institutes of Health and the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation.

We first calculated the total number of all beverage calories purchased by each consumer, which was 197. We then calculated the change in the number of calories purchased if a consumer who purchased a beverage subject to the policy shifted down to 16 ounces. Given that we don't know with certainty how many consumers will shift down, we calculated the change in calories for a number of possible scenarios. Our calculations assumed that if consumers don't shift down to 16, they will purchase two 16 ounce beverages, for a total of 32 ounces.

If 100% of consumers shift down to 16 ounces, this would result in a decrease of on average 63 calories per consumer, per fast food visit. If 90% of customers move to 16 ounces and 10% move to 32 ounces, then it results in a decrease of 53 calories per fast food visit. Calorie savings continue under most scenarios. Only If 20% or fewer of fast food patrons shift down to 16 ounces, with the remaining 80% purchasing 32 ounces, would the policy lead to a calorie increase. However, this seems an unlikely scenario—the vast majority of consumers would have to take on the hassle, and potential added expense, of purchasing two beverages. As it currently stands, about two-thirds of consumers are currently purchasing fewer than 24 ounces—a number closer to 16 ounces than 32 ounces.

This recent works just gives a snapshot of what might happen if this policy was implemented, and just for fast food restaurants. And, little concerning obesity is known with 100% certainty. But, when you consider all the research together, I believe we do have evidence that the sugar sweetened beverage policy could be influential in the fight against obesity. And, it is a step that will hopefully encourage great attention to the dangers of increased, oversized portions.

PRESS RELEASE

PRESIDENT OF THE BOROUGH OF BROOKLYN

BP MARKOWITZ TESTIMONY AT NYC DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH AND MENTAL HYGIENE HEARING ON SUGARY DRINKS AMENDMENT TO CITY HEALTH CODE
July 24, 2012

Although I am here in disagreement on this particular policy, I fully support and commend this administration's commitment to improving the health of all New Yorkers.

From expanding smoke-free zones to healthier school meals, banning trans-fats to increasing access to fresh fruits and vegetables, and reducing sodium in foods to labeling calories at fast food chains, this administration's health initiatives have proven to be enormously successful.

But despite the city's many positive health programs, I do not support the proposed ban on sugary drinks—or what I used to know as soda—larger than 16 ounces because consumers should have the ultimate say.

The way to approach the obesity epidemic is through education, advocacy, counseling, group support and, I believe most importantly, efforts to raise self-esteem, not a punitive policy that forcibly limits consumer choices.

When it comes to what we eat or drink, a one-size-fits-all approach doesn't work. Someone who exercises regularly, eats right, and has the right DNA can drink an entire two liter bottle of soda and not gain a pound. But if someone like me did that—fuhgeddaboudit!

Let me be clear: I'm overweight not because I drink Big Gulp sodas, but frankly because I eat too much pasta, pastrami sandwiches, pizza, bagels with cream cheese and lox, red velvet cake and cheesecake, don't exercise as much as I should, and my genes are working against me. I was an overweight kid and I'm an overweight adult.

There's an absolute truth that I want to share with you. Nobody wants to be obese, but for whatever reason, whether it's genetics—which plays a big part in this—overeating, or a lack of exercise, for many of us, what we eat really sticks to us.

Don't get me wrong, for those with this problem, I know large sodas, fast food, fatty foods, too much sodium, and super-sized portions, as well as "white" products—breads, pasta, rice, and baked goods—are a direct cause of the obesity epidemic. But the key is limiting them from our diets, not banning them.

So to really tackle the obesity epidemic head on, I urge the Department of Health to launch a citywide campaign to promote group exercise in the neighborhoods with particularly high rates of obesity.

And let's get the private sector involved. If the city is really serious about knocking pounds off the scale, we should create an "exercise stamp" program like "food stamps" that subsidizes the cost of gym membership, spin studios, or group exercise classes for the city's youth and low-income families. After all, you're more likely to get in shape and stay that way when you're working out with others who are facing the same challenges.

With kids glued to their computer screens, iPhones, iPads, or other electronic devices all day, only their fingers are getting a workout and not their bodies. So getting kids to be active and in shape is more important than ever. Unfortunately, right now roughly 20 percent of high school students in New York City have no physical education classes in an average week and far too many don't even have space to exercise.

That is unacceptable. When I was a kid, we had gym class every day. So let's not combat obesity by banning large sodas; let's do it with a policy that requires students to exercise every day in middle school and high school.

And in neighborhoods struggling with obesity, we should be setting up physical fitness programs and outdoor group exercise clinics led by physical trainers. In addition, we should be ensuring that all New Yorkers have access to fresh fruits and vegetables by providing incentives to developers to rent to full-service supermarkets rather than another bank or drug chain. And by opening up our schools so that they can educate not only children, but parents—on how to cook healthier and smarter meals with an emphasis on smaller portions.

As one of the most diverse places in the world, we should be sharing the best practices from our many ethnic groups to educate residents on how to prepare tasty, exciting, and healthy dishes. For instance, Asian American cuisine is delicious and also emphasizes more vegetables, smaller portions of meat, and less starch.

And with the same gusto that the city has poured into its anti-smoking ads, let's send a clear message that obesity leads to heart attacks, diabetes, high blood pressure, other deadly health risks, and lowers the quality of life, but with the caveat that the goal is not to create a society that shames everyone into being razor-thin. It's about being fit and increasing self-esteem because beauty comes in every size and shape. How sweet it is!

So when it comes to a personal decision like what I put on my dinner table, the government can educate, inform, advocate, and inspire, but cannot be the final decision maker when it comes down to what is best for me. Ultimately, it should be the consumer that decides.

It's as simple as this: the better you look, the better you feel. And the better you feel, the better you want to look and the more you'll be conscious of what you eat and drink. I said it before and I'll say it again: nobody willingly wants to be obese.

Michael F. Jacobson, Ph.D., Executive Director
Center for Science in the Public Interest
Public Hearing
Limiting the Size of Sugary Drinks at Food Service Establishments
New York City Board of Health

My name is Michael F. Jacobson. I am the executive Director of the Center for Science in the Public Interest (CSPI), a Washington, DC-based non-profit organization that promotes better nutrition and health. Since 1971, CSPI has been educating the public about healthy eating and advocating public health policies and corporate practices to make it easier for consumers to make smart food choices. Our most important contributions, some of which were propelled by courageous actions in New York City, include leading efforts to obtaining Nutrition Facts labels on packaged foods, decreasing trans fatty acids in the food supply, and obtaining a federal requirement that chain restaurants provide calorie information on menus. CSPI publishes the Nutrition Action Healthletter, the largest-circulation health newsletter in North America, with more than 850,000 subscribers including more than 13,000 in New York City.

We're here today because of the obesity crisis in America, including New York City. Between 2002 and 2010, the prevalence of obesity among adults in the city increased from 18 percent to 23 percent. Now almost 60 percent of New Yorkers are pre-obese or obese. In New York City, two-thirds of African American women and Latinas are overweight or obese compared to "just" half of white women. Obesity causes serious personal suffering, due to discrimination in the workplace, lower self-esteem, and higher medical costs. Obesity increases the risk of heart disease, diabetes, cancer, and other health problems that inflict medical costs and productivity losses that total $200 billion a year. It is vital that health officials take all feasible measures to reverse the epidemic.

Thus, CSPI wholeheartedly supports Mayor Bloomberg's proposal to limit the portion sizes of sugary drinks sold in food service establishments in New York City. I urge the Board of Health to approve the Mayor's proposal.

Limiting the portion sizes of sugary drinks is a creative way to help people cut their calories. Without depriving consumers of the opportunity to drink as much soda as they want, such action would help re-define what makes for a sensible serving size and roll back the gargantuan servings that many restaurants, ballparks, and movie theaters offer. Notably, the 16-ounce size limit for containers and cups in the Mayor's proposal is still quite generous, both historically and in terms of the calories provided. A 16-ounce Coca-Cola provides 200 empty calories and about 13½ teaspoons of sugar—an amount 50 percent greater than the daily maximum of 9 teaspoons recommended for men by the American Heart Association.

When prescribing a solution to the obesity epidemic, it makes sense to start with drinking less soda. Sugary drinks are both consumed in huge volumes—roughly 40 gallons per person per year—and are more conducive to weight gain than solid foods. Of course, there are many reasons why Americans are fatter today than ever before, but the excessive consumption of heavily marketed, ubiquitously available, and ridiculously cheap super-sized sodas has been a major contributor. That's why numerous official health reports, including the 2010 Dietary Guidelines for Americans and the Institute of Medicine's recent report, "Accelerating Progress in Obesity Prevention," recommend drinking fewer sugary drinks.

Portion sizes have ballooned from what they were 50 years ago. In the 1950s, Coca-Cola came in 6.5-ounce bottles. Now, soft drinks sometimes come in containers more akin to buckets than to glasses. Advertising and marketing budgets have swollen as well, and the products are available just about everywhere: in office buildings, libraries, gas stations, museums, hospitals, the several hundred thousand fast-food restaurants that didn't even exist in the 1950s, and literally millions of vending machines.

At Regal Cinemas and AMC Entertainment in New York, a 32-ounce soda is the smallest available—talk about freedom of choice!—and packs more than 21 teaspoons of sugar and 360 calories. That's huge, but still only half the size of KFC's half-gallon tub of Mountain Dew, which provides 50 teaspoons of sugar and 850 calories.

Giant sodas don't seem to be the norm in many other countries. Not only are standard single-serve cans only 11 ounces in Europe compared to 12 in the United States, but the drinks available at fast-food restaurants in many other countries are smaller. A large Coke in an American McDonald's is 32 ounces and has 310 calories. In a McDonald's in Spain, a large Coke is 20.3 ounces and has 190 calories. In Denmark, Austria, and Germany, the large size is 16.9

ounces and has 158 calories. Is it any wonder that Americans are so much fatter than Europeans?

It is also important to recognize that consumer choice is heavily influenced by marketers. According to a 2008 report from the Federal Trade Commission, the soda industry spent some $492 million marketing its products to children 12 to 17 years old. In 2011, Coca-Cola Co. alone spent about $2 billion promoting its sugary beverages in the United States, with a good chunk of that aimed at New Yorkers.

Moreover, a report by the Rudd Center for Food Policy and Obesity found that the industry advertises more heavily to African American and Hispanic youths than to white youths. Soda companies reinforce that marketing by donating money to minority organizations (just as they do to medical, political, and other organizations). It would be naïve to think that the donations are made without strings attached.

Retailers also do their best to encourage the purchase of ever more soda. Supermarkets in Washington, DC, have been selling 2-liter bottles of Coke for $1.00, or 1.5 cents per ounce. In contrast, an 8-pack of 7.5-ounce cans of Coke was selling for $2.50, or 4.2 cents per ounce—three times as much as the larger bottles. That price differential provides a strong incentive to purchase the largest containers, inevitably leading to over-consumption.

It's no surprise that soft-drink bottlers, restaurants, and others are fighting off the mayor's proposal—just as they have fought against menu labeling, soda taxes, banning trans fat, and smoking restrictions. Soft drinks are one of the most profitable items on a restaurant's or movie theater's menu, with the profit margin estimated to be as high as 90 percent. The extra 50 cents or so they charge for a larger soft drink is almost pure profit. That's the real issue, but it's packaged as an individual's loss of "freedom."

Industry—often masquerading as consumer groups—is probably investing millions of dollars to oppose portion size limits. They are plastering New York with anti-Bloomberg messaging, flying banners over beaches, and petitioning at movie theaters and parks. Industry talks about promoting American values of "freedom," and "choice," and the right to be left alone from government intrusions. But lost in that barrage of pro-soda propaganda is the central issue. What's best for the people of New York?

To my mind, the freedom to sell super-sized junk means little compared to the need to protect New Yorkers from the obesity epidemic. That is particularly so because consumers wouldn't be deprived. They would still be free to buy and drink as much soda as they like. Is having to buy two 12-ounce cans to replace a 20-ounce soda, or going for that free re-fill of a 16-ounce cup at the burger joint, such a burden? Is it any more restrictive than having to make a special trip to a liquor store to buy wine and spirits, rather than pick them up at the grocery store? To promote health and safety, society sets all kinds of limits or requirements on driving speed, child safety seats, immunizations, seat belt usage, hood ornaments on cars, air pollution, jay-walking, the use of certain pesticides, and many more. Portraying a vitally important health initiative as an assault on basic consumer rights is simply distracting.

Marketers' prerogative to sell as much soda as they can must be tempered by the reality that obesity and related diseases affect many New Yorkers directly and others due to higher taxes or higher health insurance premiums, or by diminishing workforce productivity. The medical tab for obesity in this city hovers around $4 billion a year. Reducing that cost is far more important than preserving the so-called right of restaurants to sell soda in harmful portion sizes. Capping portion sizes for sugary drinks is squarely consistent with the Mayor's responsibilities to protect the health of New Yorkers and the economic health of New York.

Finally, let me note that the Mayor's proposal has drawn widespread attention around the country. Adopting the portion limit—and its likely gradual acceptance by the public and retailers—would reverberate around the country. Your support for the measure would not only help New Yorkers avoid obesity, but Americans everywhere. I urge the Board of Health to approve it.

CMPI
Center for Medicine in the Public Interest

July 24, 2012 Public Testimony by Peter J. Pitts on Mayor Bloomberg's call to ban sugar-sweetened drinks in portions over 16 ounces from New York City restaurants.

My name is Peter Pitts. I am a former FDA Associate Commissioner and currently serve as President of the Center for Medicine in the Public Interest.

In 1990 Congress passed the Nutrition Labeling and Education Act (NLEA), which established the FDA-regulated Nutrition Facts Panel (what most civilians refer to as "the food label) "to assist consumers with healthy dietary practices."

The fact that the "E" in NLEA remains silent continues to go sadly unrecognized, unreported – and unaddressed. And that's a real disservice to the public health.

In July 2003, the FDA's "Better Health Through Better Nutrition" report concluded that government efforts to fight poor nutrition – and the conditions and diseases like obesity and hypertension that go along with it – would be doomed unless consumers are provided with better information about their food and beverages.

Unfortunately, today the generally accepted strategy is to impose parameters and regulations versus striving to understand what consumers respond to and how to better design programs and policies that positively influence behavior. From nutrition and food safety policy to educational initiatives, our national conversation has become a series of edicts that, given history, will become the sound and the fury, signifying – and achieving – nothing. The time for regulatory intrusion and sound bites is over.

We've learned over and over again that information, clearly communicated, can change even the most entrenched behavior – that people will make better, healthier choices. And when coupled with appropriate public health policies and consumer protections, industry responds to the demands of consumers and the new insights of science. For example, front-of-pack labeling.

By placing new calorie labels on the front of every bottle, can and pack, beverage manufacturers are helping consumers – especially parents – make informed choices that are best for them and their families.

The challenges are great, but the opportunities to make a real difference for the health of the public have also never been greater.

Let's give credit where credit is due – Mayor Bloomberg's heart is in the right place. Obesity (especially of the childhood variety) is an epidemic that is going to sink us all unless we can address it immediately and aggressively.

But we have to address it smartly.

The media circus surrounding the Mayor's call to ban large sodas is just silly. It reeks of nanny statism and diverts attention away from the issue. Plainly speaking, it trivializes the problem.

Prohibition doesn't work. How many times do we have to learn this lesson? What works is personal responsibility and adherence to the Aristotelian Mean (aka – moderation). Plus, it's hard to take the Mayor seriously when, on the heels of his anti-Big Gulp media offensive, he celebrates National Donut Day and attends the gluttonous display of the Coney Island hot dog eating contest.

It's important to put the situation, vis-à-vis sugar-sweetened beverages, into perspective.

Sugar-sweetened beverages play a small and declining portion of the American diet – just 7 percent of total calories. By nearly every measure, the contribution of calories from beverages to the diet is declining. According to the CDC, added sugars consumed from soda is down 39 percent since 2000 and from 1999-2010, full-calorie soda sales have declined 12.5 percent. Yet obesity rates are still rising. We need to focus on real ideas that address the big picture.

It's time to put headlines behind us and move on to addressing the real story.

In 2003, as an associate commissioner at the FDA and a member of that agency's Obesity Working Group, our research showed, not surprisingly, that the general public views weight management as largely a question of calories in and calories out.

So why is Mayor Bloomberg only concerned about the "calories in" part?

Is the Mayor's focus on Big Gulp Disease a sleight of hand to divert attention from the city's inability (or is it unwillingness) to address the "calories out" part of the equation?

In June the CDC reported that 20.5 percent of New York City high school students had no physical education classes -- compared with 14.4 percent a decade earlier.

New York City has not filed a physical education plan with the state since 1982. It's time for Mayor Bloomberg to step down from the bully pulpit long enough to get our kids back into the gym.

It's time for the Mayor to take a big gulp, stop talking about fizz and start focusing on phys ed.

Thank you.

Re: NAMA's Opposition to the Proposed Ban on Sweetened Beverages over 16 Oz. Sold in NYC

Dear Mayor Bloomberg:

As the nation's largest trade association representing the $42 billion vending, coffee service and foodservice management industries, the National Automatic Merchandising Association (NAMA) strongly opposes the proposed policy to ban sweetened beverages larger than 16 ounces sold in New York City. Proposals like this distract from real solutions to help reduce obesity rates and encourage healthier consumer lifestyles.

Obesity is a complex issue that cannot be blamed on individual factors, which is why restrictions that target things in isolation—such as sweetened beverages—will not solve the problem. Hence, our industry's opposition to this proposal is driven by the following key issues:

- It will cost valuable food and beverage industry jobs for New Yorkers. The food/beverage industry employs thousands of New Yorkers, especially in small business establishments. They could be faced with job reduction or loss by employers who will have to increase costs in order to comply with this proposal.
- It restricts consumer freedom of choice. New Yorkers are capable of deciding for themselves what they want and how much they want to buy and drink. Restricting the sale of legal and safe beverages like soda, tea, and sports drinks is overreaching; it does nothing to increase access to healthier options or ensure the behavioral changes necessary to achieving a healthy life style.
- It is ineffective. The proposal ignores the fact that sweetened beverages are a declining portion of the average American diet—a mere 7% of total calories consumed. Further, full calorie soda sales have declined 12.5%; and per Centers for Disease Control (CDC) data, added sugars consumed from soda are down 39% since 2000.
- It is unbalanced. This proposal singles out and limits sweetened beverages that New Yorkers may consume. Yet there are not comparable limits on other, more detrimental consumables, such as alcohol, that they may consume or purchase. Further, the proposal will cause New Yorkers to pay a higher price to enjoy their preferred beverages.
- It is NOT supported by the citizens. New Yorkers are being forced to accept this proposal (without a public referendum or City Council vote) through the administrative authority of the New York Department of Health. Recent poll data (from NY1/Marist, Quinnipiac University, Reuters, Intelligencia, and Ramussen Reports) shows that as much as 70% of New Yorkers reject the idea of a ban on beverage size.

This proposal is a classic example of regulating on a slippery slope. Should it move forward, consumers will be forced to worry about what local regulations could impact them next, such as how much of their favorite foods they can eat or buy.

Our partners in the beverage industry have taken solid, measurable action on a national scale to encourage people to make good food and beverage choices for themselves. Help from your Administration is needed in the form of nutrition and lifestyle education as well as access to healthier foods—not beverage regulation. Accordingly, we respectfully ask that you consider solutions other than the current proposal to limit the size of sweetened beverages sold in New York City to 16 ounces.

Approve the Mayor's Sensible Beverage Proposal

I am writing in support of Mayor Michael Bloomberg's sensible proposal to limit the size of soda and similar sugar-sweetened beverages sold in restaurants, movie theaters and food carts to 16 ounces. I applaud the mayor for taking this strong step to tackle obesity rates in New York City, and I urge you to approve the proposal.

Norms for sugary drink sizes are alarmingly high, as 32 and 64 ounce sodas are commonplace across the city. Even the proposed limit of 16 ounces is still double a standard 8-ounce serving. Mayor Bloomberg's plan is backed by extensive scientific research that shows growing portion sizes for sugary drinks are among the driving forces of the ongoing obesity epidemic. The Institute of Medicine recently recommended that government leaders adopt policies and implement practices to reduce over-consumption of sugary drinks, which are a top source of calories in Americans' diets.

Right now, about one-third of children and two-thirds of adults are overweight or obese. Obesity is an epidemic, and it contributes to growing rates of type 2 diabetes, heart disease, hypertension and even some cancers. If we do not reverse childhood obesity in particular, this generation of kids could be the first in America's history to live sicker and die younger than their parents' generation.

Bold action from leaders like you is needed to reverse the obesity epidemic, and we can't wait!

New York is one of the greatest cities in the world, and you have the opportunity to make it even greater, by continuing to lead the nation in using policy to improve nutrition and prevent obesity. Please approve Mayor Bloomberg's proposal and serve up a healthy change for our great city.

Sincerely,

New York City Department of Health and Mental Hygiene Board of Health
2 Gotham Center, 14 th Floor, Room 14-15, Box 31

Dear Members of the Board of Health: Board of Health,

As someone very concerned about the obesity epidemic and health care costs in this country, I am writing in support of Mayor Bloomberg's proposal to limit serving sizes of soda and other sugary drinks. The Mayor's leadership on the soda issue provides a good model for other jurisdictions to follow, because overweight and obesity have become commonplace throughout America, mirroring the growth of soda serving sizes over the past five decades. More than two-thirds of adults and one in three children are overweight or obese in this country. While Mayor Bloomberg's proposal may not alone solve our obesity problem, it is a step in the right direction.

Numerous scientific studies have demonstrated that sugary drinks, both carbonated and non-carbonated, are a major contributor to the obesity epidemic. Sugary drinks are the only food or beverage source that has been directly linked to obesity. They are the single largest contributor of calories to the American diet, as well as a leading source of added sugars. One study found that each extra soft drink consumed per day was associated with a 60-percent increased risk of overweight in children. Countless studies document that excess weight is a prime risk factor for type-2 diabetes, heart attacks, strokes, cancer, sleep apnea, and many other problems. Frequent consumption of soft drinks also contributes to osteoporosis, tooth decay, and dental erosion.

Once consumed in relatively small quantities, usually as a treat, sugary drinks now come in gargantuan proportions, available almost everywhere. Container sizes have grossly expanded over the past 50 years, and today's new standard, the 20-ounce bottle of Coke, contains 16 teaspoons of sugar! The 7-Eleven chain of convenience stores even offers a 64-ounce Double Gulp - which contains more than 50 teaspoons of sugar!

Restoring an understanding among consumers of more reasonable serving sizes - even a 16-ounce maximum as the Mayor has proposed is very generous by historical standards - will help cut down on some soda consumption and slow the expansion of New Yorkers' waistlines. Unfortunately, no measure would be perfect or fully effective, and consumers will still be able to buy as much soda as they want. But, in all likelihood, many of them will be as satisfied with smaller amounts instead of the huge tubs of sugary beverages they consume today.

I strongly encourage the Board of Health to vote in support of the Mayor's proposal to limit serving sizes and I look forward to your

Dear Dr. Farley,

I am a New Yorker, although not a citizen of the city I live in up-state NY, and find your decision to ban "ANYTHING", Offensive! Who do you think you are "God"? Since when did you join the Communist/Socialist parties?
Please, make your true political agenda, and alliance, public, so we know who, and what we are voting for, the next election.

I am writing you today to ask that you please reject the proposed ban on the sale of fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces.

Restricting the sale of certain beverage sizes in New York City hurts our restaurants, theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks, street carts, and all those who are dependent on beverage sales for their livelihoods.

Furthermore, I believe it should be up to me, and not my government, to choose my serving sizes for me. The answer to curbing obesity is diet, exercise, and a healthy lifestyle, not restrictions on soft drinks, juice drinks, sports drinks, and teas.

On behalf of New Yorkers like me, please reject the proposed ban on the sale of beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

Sincerely,

I support 16 ounce soda limit - Article 81.

Dear Health Board Members,

More than two-thirds of adults and more than one-third of children are overweight or obese in this country. Sugary drinks are the biggest contributor to the excess calories added to the average American diet since the 1970s. They are the primary source of added sugars in children's diets. With every additional sugary beverage a child drinks daily, his/her odds of becoming obese increase by 60%.

I don't live in New York City, but I would benefit from New York City adopting Mayor Bloomberg's proposal to limit the size of sugary drinks sold in New York City food service establishments to 16 ounces. Article 81 will decrease sugary beverage consumption in New York but it will also make New York City a role model for cities across the country looking to combat sugary beverage overload.

I support Mayor Bloomberg's proposal. Please approve it. I am looking to New York City to lead the way to a healthier tomorrow.

Sincerely,

The government is getting too involved in our lives.

I'm writing to you because I believe it should be up to me-not the government-to make nutritional choices for my family.

A limit on beverage sizes will not limit consumption; it will only limit personal choice.
Please say "No" to Mayor Bloomberg's ban on beverages over 16 ounces.

Sincerely,

A ban on beverages over 16 ounces won't make New Yorkers healthier.

Dear Dr. Farley,

I believe education, overall diet, and exercise determine the health of an individual.
I also believe obesity cannot-and should not-be solved through a discriminatory ban on a single product.

I ask that the Department of Health reject beverage restrictions that only serve as an illustration of another example of government overreach.

Please stop the ban on the sale of beverages over 16 ounces.

Why are my tax dollars being used to limit soda sizes?

Instead of proposing ineffective regulations to reduce our waists, government should be looking into ways to reduce its own waste.

Spending time on frivolous regulations is a waste of taxpayer resources and time. Please say "No" to new arbitrary beverage size limits. Keep our city focused on what works and what matters.

Dear Dr. Farley,

Placing a size limitation on beverages will not help children make better nutritional choices.

Instead we should focus on teaching children about balanced diets and exercise.

That's why I ask the Department of Health to focus on things that work instead of focusing on beverage size restrictions that won't work.

On behalf of New Yorkers like me, please say "No" to the proposed ban on the sale of beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

Dear Dr. Farley,

New York City is a good place to live-but we pay dearly for the privilege. Between rising food and housing costs, high unemployment, and the general excise tax, New York City's cost of living far outpaces any other U.S. city.

In this economy, shouldn't we be focusing on jobs and wages instead of focusing on soda sizes? Please reject the ban on the sale of beverages over 16 ounces.

Sincerely,

New beverage sizes are bad for NYC businesses.

Dear Dr. Farley,

Right now, what New York City needs are jobs and policies that promote business. What we don't need are useless, ineffective regulations.

Shrinking beverage sizes will only serve to shrink local restaurant and grocery store sales and jobs.

Please stop the proposal to ban beverages over 16 ounces and focus on what works and what really matters-preserving our city's businesses, wages, and jobs.

Dear Commissioner Farley:

I am firmly against your proposal to ban the sale of fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces in restaurants, movie theatres, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks and street carts. This won't help solve obesity.

This ban sets a dangerous precedent by giving the City the power to make personal choices for us. If this is now, what's next?

Fighting obesity and advocating for a healthier New York City is a priority, but don't trample our personal freedoms and rights in the process.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.

NEW YORKERS FOR BEVERAGE CHOICES

Mayor Bloomberg is proposing to ban sales of sugar-sweetened beverages over 16 ounces in New York City.

While New Yorkers would be limited to 16-ounce beverages, they would still be able to indulge in other high calorie items. Fountain and bottled beverages over 16 ounces could no longer be sold in restaurants, movie theaters, sports venues, coffee shops, food trucks or street carts. This restriction will cover everything from soft drinks to juice drinks to sports drinks and even some coffee drinks and teas!

According to the Mayor, New Yorkers need help deciding what size beverage is appropriate. We disagree. We are New Yorkers for Beverage Choices—a coalition of citizens, businesses and community organizations who believe that consumers have the right to purchase beverages in whatever size they choose. We urge the Board of Health to reject this proposed measure. We can make our own choices.
